STAGE FRIGHT!

Because other people are nervous there is no reason why YOU should be.

THE

Mackinnon Method

banishes "nerves" and makes playing from memory a pleasure.

A successful L.R.A.M. Candidate writes :
"The lesson on Nervousness was more help to me than I can say."

A Correspondent in South Africa writes :
"I have much more confidence, and experience no nervousness when I play to my friends or an audience."

After a first concert, an Amateur writes :
"My memory remained true, and I did not have a single slip."

An Amateur writes :
"I have had several opportunities lately of playing before my friends, and each time noticed that the old nervousness and fear had gone."

Another writes :
"My memory is now perfect, and I can play to anyone without fear of breaking down."

A Professional writes :
"Of course it's a marvellous System."

The Method is recommended by famous musicians, including

CORTOT, MATTHAY, HESS, BAUER, TALICH, KOUSSEVITZKY.

THE FEE FOR THE COMPLETE COURSE OF SIX POSTAL LESSONS IS £3 : 3 : 0

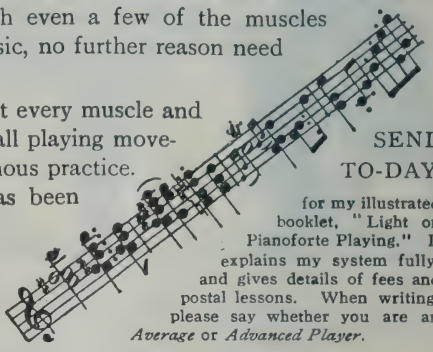
The Pianist's Hands

The Times says: "The excellence of Mr. Macdonald Smith's methods has been abundantly proved."

PREVALENT among pianists is the idea that you cannot play well unless you have a special sort of hand; this is a mistake. It is obvious, however, that the hands must be in perfect condition, otherwise the many technical difficulties to be overcome will be found insuperable. For a pianist every single muscle of the hands and arms must move the instant it is required to do so, and if this fails to be the case with even a few of the muscles brought into play in any complicated passage of music, no further reason need be sought to account for failure.

Let the "From Brain to Keyboard" System perfect every muscle and nerve in your hands and give you instant control over all playing movements without any of the usual drudgery and monotonous practice. Why not learn something about the System that has been used by many of our eminent musicians.



SEND TO-DAY for my illustrated booklet, "Light on Pianoforte Playing." It explains my system fully, and gives details of fees and postal lessons. When writing, please say whether you are an Average or Advanced Player.

"MASTERY OF THE KEYBOARD"

SIGHT-READING LESSONS

COMPLETE COURSE OF SIX POSTAL LESSONS

The Times: "Deals with the subject systematically from the first stage."

Music: "Goes fully and thoroughly into his subject from every possible standpoint. Cannot fail to be of service."

A PUPIL FROM CHINA WRITES: "My master is a gifted pianist, a minor genius, but he has not the least idea how he sight-reads, and cannot explain."

AFTER SECOND LESSON: "Your course has so far quite revolutionised my playing, and even now I am finding pieces far easier to sight-read."

ARS VIVENDI BREATHING
is a NEW DEPARTURE in HEALTH and VOICE CULTURE . . .

IT is the outcome of years of research and practice, and its beneficial effect is felt very speedily.

The straight road to the goal, it saves time and labour frequently spent in vain. A large proportion of those who study singing are obliged to abandon it through voice and throat troubles, or nervous break-down. This is due to the intimate connection between voice and health, the nerve centres of the throat dominating the whole organism physically and mentally. Wrong use of voice, whether in singing, speaking, or ordinary conversation, implies constriction of throat, which produces nervous strain, leading to nervous exhaustion. Right use of voice raises nervous tone, and improves the health.

The ARS VIVENDI SYSTEM goes straight to the root of the problem, as the following extract from a letter recently received from a well-known M.D., F.R.C.P. (Wimpole Street), shows:

"Surely the practical advantages of your method of Breathing must commend themselves to all wise persons. Contrary to what singers teach, I have always advised this as something to be aimed at,

BUT I NEVER SAW BEFORE HOW TO DO IT."

¶ In the ARS VIVENDI SYSTEM, nasal congestion is dealt with without need of surgical operation, and impure intonation disappears; throat and chest are strengthened; effects of prolonged strain are removed, while the diaphragm becomes stronger day after day.

The result is speedy improvement in EASE OF PRODUCTION, CONTROL OF BREATH, ENDURANCE, REACH, RESONANCE, and QUALITY OF TONE.

The Courses are Personal and Correspondence. The Correspondence Course of Twelve Lessons is written, personally and confidentially, to each pupil according to individual requirements, not stereotyped. The Fees for the Course are Five Guineas.

All Smoking affects the throat!

Pipe, cigar or cigarette—no matter which—the delicate membranes of the throat object to smoke, which eventually produces irritation, either mild or severe. To prevent this, take an 'Allenburys' Glycerine and Black Currant Pastille occasionally between smokes and let it dissolve in the mouth Containing pure glycerine and the luscious fruit juice of ripe black currants, they are delightfully soothing.

PERSONAL LESSONS DAY AND EVENING.

Can you play from memory?

Many musicians never receive due recognition of their talents, never command the respect and popularity they deserve. The crucial moment—the test of playing in public—finds them wanting. Brilliant in touch, execution, and technique, they fail because the ordeal unnerves them. Probably your ability is greater than you know. THE MASTER-METHOD will banish all fear of the criticism of your most candid friend. It will develop your powers of concentration, create self-confidence when playing before others, and above all give you a reliable memory which will "never let you down." ∴ ∴ I guarantee your success.

MASTER-METHOD OF MEMORY-PLAYING

If memorising is your weakness do not hesitate to send for my free descriptive Booklet on this all-absorbing subject. Please state whether you play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ, and if a moderate or advanced player.

BERLIOZ'S 'TROJANS'

BY RICHARD CAPELL

Berlioz foresaw himself enjoying the sweets of his artistic labours—if only he could live to be a hundred and forty.* He foresaw appreciation, that is to say, in the 1940's. That time is now not far off.

If Berlioz were surviving to-day it is possible that he might feel that the charming 1940's were not worth waiting for, in the face of a still embittered lot and a world still hostile and ingrate. Would life for him have been at all tolerable in the midst of present-day music—for him who more than eighty years was exclaiming† against musicians whose taste for excessive modulations and dissonances was like that of 'certain animals for the thistle'? On the other hand, he might have been gratified by certain signs and omens—by the fascination which his personality has never failed to exercise even where his art is not loved, and by the veritable passion felt for that art by some of the most considerable men of the 1920's—Weingartner, Beecham, and Harty among the conductors, and among the critics Ernest Newman, Cecil Gray, W. J. Turner,‡ and Romain Rolland.

Sir Thomas Beecham has promised that Berlioz's 'Trojans' shall be one of his first productions if a National Opera is founded under his direction; and meanwhile, at Manchester—where, thanks to Hallé and Richter, there has long been a certain Berlioz cult—Sir Hamilton Harty has given§ a concert performance of the second part ('The Trojans at Carthage') of his principal operatic work, which, except to the specialists, is unknown in England to-day save for the remarkable Intermezzo ('Chasse Royale') which both Harty and Beecham are fond of playing. 'The Trojans at Carthage' had last been sung in England—also at a Manchester concert—in 1897.

The two Trojan operas belong to the last phase of Berlioz's career, but the subject (like that of nearly every one of his major works) had been planted in his mind during his enthusiastic youth. Again and again in his disillusioned middle and latter years, when his guardian angel was warning him that he was spoiling his life, while the demon within him urged him on the reckless way—again and again he grasped at one or other of the visions of the bygone time when all things had seemed possible.

As a small boy Berlioz had delighted in Virgil, and the Æneid was the inspiration of this, the last but one of his major works. (The last of all was the opera 'Beatrice and Benedict,' written in 1860 and produced at Baden in 1862.) For 'The Trojans' the world is partly indebted to Liszt's Russian mistress, the Princess Caroline Sayn-Wittgenstein. Berlioz first met that celebrated blue-stocking at St. Petersburg in 1847. In 1852 began their correspondence, which ceased only with Berlioz's death in 1869. The strong-willed princess pressed him to undertake an opera on a classic theme, and even sketched the scenario which, under her encouragement, he himself elaborated into a libretto—in a style 'beautiful in diction and beautifully rhythmical.'*

By the beginning of 1857 an Act and a half was composed. In May, 1858, the whole work was ready for performance, and excerpts were played at Baden. But Berlioz, even at this stage of his career, had not the entry to the Paris Opéra. His rejoicings over the failure of 'Tannhäuser' (1861), which read so disagreeably, are to be put down to the acidity of oft-frustrated hopes. 'The Trojans' was actually accepted for production at the Opéra, but after long delays which brought the prospect of performance no nearer, Berlioz accepted an offer made by Carvalho, the manager of the Théâtre Lyrique.

Carvalho could not cope with the whole of the huge work. The first two Acts ('The Fall of Troy') were, therefore, abandoned, and the rest, with a new prelude (a lament for Priam's house) was produced as 'The Trojans at Carthage,' on November 4, 1863. Sir Henry Hadow says in 'Grove'† that after a short run the opera 'was driven from the boards,' and that 'Berlioz never recovered the shock of its failure.' But as a matter of fact the septet, 'Tout n'est que paix,' was encored on the first night, the critics were favourable, and the opera was performed twenty-two times in the season. The composer's rights enabled him to give up journalism, of which he was tired (although it is likely that he had not always written for the Débats as reluctantly as he was fond of declaring); and Choudens, the publisher, paid him fifteen thousand francs for the score.‡

It is deplorable that Berlioz never heard his grandiose opera performed in full, but, with all

‡ 'Now Berlioz has magic, Bach has none. Berlioz also had a far more original mind than Bach, and Berlioz's originality was so great that even to-day he is still in advance of all that has been invented since, so much so that he has not yet found his public, although that self-advertised creator of the "Music of the Future," Wagner, has long ago become a popular favourite.'—Turner's 'Musical Meanderings' (1928).

respect to 'Grove,' the failure and the shock must be put down as yet another of the legends of the musical historians. Discount must also be allowed for Romain Rolland's inveterate sentimentality. The 'Grove' article might have taken into consideration Saint-Saëns's cool analysis:

> 'Berlioz's misery was due to his capacity for inventing sufferings for himself and to his craving for impossibilities. He harboured a wrong-headed idea, one that he also did much to disseminate—namely, that a composer had no business to take into account material obstacles.'*

And in the same essay:

> 'He was not, as some would have it, killed by the injustice of men, but by a gastric complaint caused by his obstinate disregard of medical advice and of an hygienic regimen.
> 'I could see it with my own eyes without being able to do a thing to help, in the course of a tour on which I had the honour of accompanying him. "An extraordinary thing has happened to me," he said one morning; "I am not in pain!" And he told me of his sufferings, of his continual stomachal cramp, and of his doctor's warning against all stimulants and any departure from a certain diet. . . . Well, he adopted no regimen, and took everything he had a fancy for, without a thought for the morrow. That evening there was a banquet. Seated near him I did my best to dissuade him from the champagne, the coffee, the cigars. In vain; and next morning my poor hero was writhing in his accustomed torture.'†

'The Trojans,' as now published, consists of two operas, although as performed at the Paris Opéra it is (by large excisions) reduced to one evening's entertainment. In Choudens's edition 'The Fall of Troy' is in three Acts and 'The Trojans at Carthage' in four. The former was first produced at Karlsruhe in 1890, under Mottl.

In the first scene, the Trojan people are disporting themselves after ten years of siege, on the site of the Greek camp. Some simply delight to breathe the air of peace and freedom again; others collect relicts—helmets and javelins—of the departed enemy. In their ignorance they wonder at the monstrous wooden horse left behind by the Greeks. Only Cassandra is tormented by apprehension. She implores Chorœbus, her betrothed, to flee from Priam's doomed kingdom, but he fondly scorns the warning.

The second Act begins with a Trojan march and hymn in celebration of peace. The rejoicings are overclouded by the appearance of the widowed Andromache and Astyanax in mourning. The note of tragedy is reinforced by Æneas's sudden arrival with the tale of Laocoon's fate in the grip of the miraculous serpents. This portent is read as a divine injunction to the Trojans to take the horse within their walls as an object of worship. Cassandra's frantic warnings pass unheeded.

The third Act opens in Æneas's tent. To him in sleep appears Hector's ghost to announce the entrance of the Greeks, their victory, and the burning of the city. Æneas must, says the spectral voice, flee with his son and followers to found in a distant land a new Troy. The news of Troy's ruin is confirmed to the now awakened Æneas by the priest Pantheus, by Chorœbus, by Æneas's son Ascanius, and defeated soldiers.

The scene changes to the temple of Vesta-Cybele, where the despairing women of Troy have sought shelter. Without, the city burns. To them Cassandra announces that Æneas has saved Priam's treasure and has retreated in safety; but Chorœbus is dead and she desires life no longer. She stabs herself, as do the rest of the women, just as the Greeks rush into the temple.

In the first Act of 'The Trojans at Carthage' we learn that the widowed Dido has rejected the suit of Iarbas, King of Numidia, and intends to devote herself to the memory of her dead husband. The wandering Trojans are announced and are hospitably received. Then comes news of affronted Numidia's declaration of war. Æneas reveals himself and volunteers to lead the Carthaginian forces.

In the second Act, in the course of a festival held to celebrate the Carthaginian victory, Dido yields to Æneas's suing. Queen and hero mingle their vows of love; but at the end, as they pass into the palace, the apparition of the god Mercury comes to utter portentously the word 'Italy!'

The famous Intermezzo here occurs. Then in Act 3 we hear from Pantheus of Æneas's decision to obey the supernatural summons. The common soldiers are well satisfied with Carthage, but the spirits of the dead Trojans leave their leader no peace. In the fourth Act Dido realises that she has lost her lover. After an access of rage, despair seizes her. She determines to die. Her funeral pyre is built on the sea-shore. There she stabs herself and dies, but not before foreseeing the secular enmity between Rome and Carthage and—the last horror of her agony—the final destruction of her city. The stage picture at the end shows us above Dido's pyre—before which her mourning people vow eternal hatred of Æneas and his race—a vision of the Roman Capitol in all its glory.

Can the value of this vast scheme be appraised? The Manchester performance, brilliant though it was, only made it clear that 'The Trojans' is not concert music. Sir Thomas Beecham said once that some music has not merely a different effect but is felt to be of a totally different nature and essence when heard in association with dramatic action and spectacle.

To us in England, brought up as we all have been on the German classics, Berlioz's music is a baffling phenomenon. The poverty of so many of the ideas and of so much of the texture! Looking at the pianoforte score of 'The Trojans' many a man would say that it was negligible music. And yet in practice Berlioz is found to be a charmer, unless one is accessible to nothing but German musical syntax. At its least interesting this music sounds better than it looks—sounds more bright and clear. At its best it sounds unpredictably different.

Berlioz's art in placing a note or chord (with its associated—its indissociable—instrumental timbre) fascinates the ear. This poetry of sound makes itself felt again and again in 'The Trojans.' One example is in the septet, 'Tout n'est que paix,' Act 2—in the deep, occasional, and pianissimo chords of the bass strings and bass-drum beneath the light accompaniment of flutes, clarinets, and horns. Dido's entrance and the scene of the apparitions contain other examples. In the Intermezzo these Berliozian flashes come thick and fast. Every concert-goer, though he has not heard 'The Trojans,' will know what is meant if he casts his thoughts back to the slow movement of the 'Fantastic' Symphony.

The flashes are nevertheless not numerous enough always to sustain the interest in a concert performance of 'The Trojans.' It is possibly the listener's fault. Without being quite as stupid as Mr. Gray holds him to be,* the ordinary listener asks, perhaps unreasonably, from every music the sustained explanatory conduct of the German masters. The rehearsed, cogent, adequate speech—that is the classic music we know. Berlioz gives hints of another sort of music, one of intuition and the sudden blow of wit, the moment's invention for the moment's need. But has he shown that such a music can be sustained? There are brilliantly rhythmical movements in Berlioz. There are the 'flashes' which are comparable with the surprising illumination of one of Shakespeare's daring words. There are also, in 'The Trojans,' stretches of dull writing. Berlioz is exciting when himself excited, but then there is a drop, and it becomes hard to see any interest in his ordinary style.

'He had a natural gift of style,' says Rolland† —but the reference is to Berlioz's prose. Precisely that gift is what his music is felt to lack. In his fiery moments he engendered the modern Russian school. But in the intervals between his inspirations there is a remplissage. It is as though Berlioz had absented himself, so uncharacteristic is the phraseology. The father of Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov falls back on turns of phrase suggestive of Gluck and early Beethoven. Mr. Bonavia, in his critique of 'The Trojans,' connected a drop in the musical interest with Berlioz's lack of interest in certain characters—in Anna and Æneas. But when Wagner found a personage like Fricka on his hands—a dreary but necessary personage who inspired him with no characteristic phrase—he could lend her from his general vocabulary resources that maintained her handsomely.

Berlioz's every-day vocabulary was meagre. He was one of those men who are at their best in affluence; but he came of a poor family. He should have been born of a different generation; or Gossec, Lesueur, and Reicha should have been greater musicians. He took from that heritage anything that was of use. The idea of the colossal effects in his 'Requiem' and 'Te Deum' was inherited from the music of the French Revolution—from such things as Ignace Pleyel's choral 'Tocsin Allégorique' (1793), in which the orchestral accompaniment was augmented by military drums, cannon, and bells requisitioned from the Strassburg churches, and Gossec's 'Hymne à l'Etre Suprême' (Paris, 1794), which was performed by a chorus of two thousand four hundred.* Reicha, Berlioz's professor of counterpoint at the Conservatoire, wrote for kettle-drums in four-part harmony in his choral work 'L'Harmonie des Sphères.'

Mr. Gray surely goes rather far when he says, 'He [Berlioz] owes nothing to any predecessors'; but it is true that there was all too little to borrow. The French romantic poets refreshed their language at 17th-century and older sources, but Berlioz could find no corresponding spring. Fancy suggests that he might have remained at St. Petersburg and become the most brilliant Russian of them all. The sailor's song at the beginning of the third Act of 'The Trojans' might, sung in Russian, easily be taken for Glinka, or even Moussorgsky.

But all these remarks are fancies—so much was admitted above in the confession that 'The Trojans' has still to be seen in England as an opera. The stage may make all the difference. We know from 'Lontano, lontano!' in Boïto's 'Mefistofele' what a poetry can reside in a music which would appear jejune as a concert piece. So may the duet 'Nuit d'ivresse' in Act 2 of 'The Trojans' escape from the seeming monotony of its hundred and twenty bars of regular 6-8 time.

One word of warning before the Imperial League of Opera stages 'The Trojans': the English version used at Manchester will not do at all.

* He says that the low level of his dynamic intensity is 'one of the main reasons of Berlioz's unpopularity with the multitude. Most of them feel that they are not getting their money's worth if the whole orchestra, and the organ as well, are not kept blaring away most of the time'—C. Gray's 'History of Music,' p. 215.

TCHAIKOVSKY

By Leonid Sabaneev

Beyond doubt Tchaikovsky is one of the names that adorn the world's treasury of musical geniuses and represent the incontestable contribution of Russian art to that treasury. Like most composers possessed of genius, Tchaikovsky experienced the fluctuations of the barometer of recognition—his praises were sung at one period of his life, and then for a time he was repudiated; now, and apparently for ever, he has found a place in the Pantheon of genius. He has a twofold significance: he belongs to Russia and to the world, and for that very reason any estimate of him should also be twofold. As a Russian composer he has a historical value, in that he was the first big and really gifted professional musician who by his creative work put an end to the domination of amateurism in Russia—a domination which had, perhaps, been unduly prolonged. The amateurism of the Russian composers may at times have been gifted with genius, but that made it only the more dangerous. Tchaikovsky's significance, however, is not restricted to this. In his Russian quality he has hitherto been insufficiently appreciated, particularly in Russia. At the time when his name had triumphantly made its way into Germany and the rest of Europe, when in his person Russian art was united to its 'world metropolis,' that name had become in his own land a synonym for retrogression and hidebound conservatism. It is true that the period of his disqualification is past and is now a matter of history, but it is characteristic and indicative; his true importance, for Russia as well as for the world, is, I repeat, not yet fully appreciated.

There are still several European countries genuinely unable to comprehend Tchaikovsky or to understand his world-importance. Amongst them France occupies the first place. To the French musician Tchaikovsky has hitherto been a sort of Russian Massenet—a composer for the drawing-room or for the man in the street. The æstheticism characteristic of the French musical sense is strikingly evident in their non-comprehension of his significance. In actual fact it is clear, a priori, that Tchaikovsky in his intimate musical outlook on the world, in the psychological sources of his creative work, will always be strange and incomprehensible to France, although French music (in particular Bizet and Meyerbeer) may at one time have had a great influence upon him. When he is mentioned, not only the average French musician but the European in general usually expresses the opinion that he is not typically or sufficiently Russian, and this is regarded as a defect. In my view this opinion needs to be refuted.

Russian music happens to occupy a peculiar position in the general chorus of the national arts of Europe. I refer to the inevitable demand for nationalism, and for ethnographic nationalism in particular, which for some reason is addressed to it. When a German or an English composer writes music, it is not expected to be unconditionally German or English, with folk-songs and characteristic melodies and rhythms and a specific treatment of the subject. All this may happen to be present, but as a rule it does not even attract attention. With Russian music the opposite is the case; from the very moment of its expansion, and almost without the happy co-operation of its own Russian musicians and ideologists, Russian music imposed upon itself ethnographic nationalism as an invariable requirement and condition. It wanted to be specifically Russian, and not European and Russian as well. It seemed desirous of flaunting its anti-Europeanism, its 'speciality'; it gave the pride of place, not so much to affiliation to European musical culture, as to an actual and pugnacious rejection of that culture, and to the setting-up of something of its own in opposition to it. Thereby it may have attracted immediate notice, but at the same time it restricted its sphere, since the scope of a deliberate nationalism is essentially and unvaryingly narrow. A demand began to be made on Russian music for beauty of a specific kind, a titillating, barbaric beauty that should be unlike the beauty of European music. Such epithets as 'barbaric power,' 'wild vigour,' 'Oriental charm,' still form part of the vocabulary of many European critics when discussing Russian music. Moussorgsky's world-wide success may be partly due to this anti-Europeanism, this insistence on Asia.

Meanwhile Russian music in its nature and essence is not a branch of Asiatic culture which has somehow found an entry into the European consciousness; it belongs to European musical culture. Furthermore, I consider that the special feature which people usually discover in Russian music is greatly exaggerated; on a careful examination it may possibly be found that very little of its 'barbarism' remains. Moussorgsky's modest and lyrical barbarism is, of course, left far behind by the barbarism of modern European innovators, and Russian vocal melody is on the whole not more characteristic than, let us say, Scottish song. But there is another nationalism in music, more temperate and less rectilinear—the nationalism of the music of Chopin, Schubert, Wagner, Weber, and Grieg. If we measure the potential of nationalism of these composers and the Russians, we shall notice that those who are recognised as Russian in the world-scale possess it in an incomparably greater degree. And if we compare Tchaikovsky with these same composers of European nationalism, he will prove to have approximately the same tensity of the national potential. This level of the national potential is that at which a composer, whilst preserving certain characteristic peculiarities of the national psychology and structural form, nevertheless does not perceptibly depart from the general European family of musicians and the European style.

Tchaikovsky was never a preacher of æsthetic doctrines, nor was he an innovator. In this lies the contrast between him and the *kuchkist composers, and not in his music. Now, when time has carried us sufficiently far from the kuchka and from him, we see more clearly that the difference between these antipodes—as they once were—of the Russian musical world is far less important than was formerly imagined. In the creations of the kuchkisty there is much of the general European, which found its way into them often against the composer's will, whilst Tchaikovsky's works contain much that could only have come from a Russian. I will go further: at the present time it is evident to me and to many others that the ethnographic nationalism of the kuchkisty, in spite of the astonishing effect it produced on the Europe of yesterday, is artistically less bound up with the European facture of their music. The melodies of the kuchkisty, taken in their pure form from the people, are far less successful in their Liszt-Berlioz setting than the Russian melos as transmuted in Tchaikovsky's psychology, and the Russian musical style as expressed by him in a Germanic form. In his compositions there is a greater transformation of the Russian melody into the European facture and we get a better blended amalgam, but with Rimsky-Korsakov these components constitute two fluids, as it were, which do not mix.

Turning to the psychological bases of their creative work, we see that with the kuchkisty musical objectivism prevails, and on the whole they contemplate the Russian folk-music and its style from the outside—they are merely interested spectators—whereas in the case of Tchaikovsky the composer himself shares the experiences of the soul of the people, and feels as they feel. His melody is as characteristic a product of the Russian musical consciousness as any folk-song. With the kuchkisty, however, a national sense is lacking, and is replaced by the simple external expedient of borrowing tunes from the people. In their creative methods they were essentially arrangers of folk-music, but Tchaikovsky, like Chopin, Grieg, and Wagner, was the composer of original tunes and musical thoughts, sometimes created in the form and semblance of popular melodies.

Tchaikovsky's nationalism, more transformed and amalgamated with European musical culture, was unnoticed by Europe, which was conscious of his European exterior rather than of his Russian entity. Some, who think that anything Russian can be interesting only so far as it is 'agreeably barbaric,' considered this a defect, but others held the more correct view that the affiliation to European culture was a merit. In the final reckoning, it is not by the specifically national but by the universal element in their work that the world measures the genius of Chopin and Wagner. The specifically national, the 'agreeably barbaric,' can never be more than an interesting phenomenon, or an antidote to satiety.

Tchaikovsky is a composer gifted with real genius, which is expressed in the straightforward simplicity of his work. In this he follows the laws observed by Schubert, Chopin, and Beethoven. With no desire to be original, he proves to be unlike anyone else; having no pretensions to innovation, he was really the founder of one of the most important schools of style. Like Schubert or Beethoven, he is possessed by melos, and his creative work is based on melody. On the whole it may be said that the second half of the 19th century produced no melodist equal to Tchaikovsky. And this melodiousness of his sprang from Russian soil; it is typically Russian, though it may not be recognisable as such by Europeans, as it is more subtle and less openly and demonstratively presented.

His sense of music is characteristically Russian; for him it is never a formal problem, a chess problem, but always and only the voice of the soul. His æsthetics may be naïve and primitive—they are the æsthetics of an ordinary, everyday man, who receives music directly and simply, without guile; and herein lies the secret of his enormous reaction on the general public. This music is free from any 'snobism'—a fact which may account for the antipathy it arouses amongst the æsthetes, who charge it with primitiveness and even banality. We know that Beethoven in his time did not escape similar censure, and for the very same thing—for the too frankly expressive nature of his compositions, for what was with both these composers the means of self-expression. They were two sensitive souls who felt strongly and simply, and in this lies the similarity between them.

Possibly there is another element of resemblance between these great symphonic lyricists. It is the lofty professionalism and constant desire to work at music. Both of them have many unsuccessful, second-rate compositions, in which they remain masters of their art but not of their inspiration. Tchaikovsky has more failures than Beethoven, but the creative work of each of them has its summits, its Monts Blancs, at which they become geniuses, unattainable and at the same time infinitely simple. Such are, in the case of Tchaikovsky, his last Symphonies, 'Francesca da Rimini,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' some of his songs, certain passages in the operas. Neither Beethoven nor Tchaikovsky was in any sense a doctrinaire, nor a preacher of anything—they were content to speak through their artistic achievements.

But there are vast differences between the two composers, and here we have perhaps the clearest expression of the Russian type of Tchaikovsky and the European (or, to be more exact, the Anglo-German) type of Beethoven—the former weak-willed, elegiac, pessimistic, seeing in life an insuperable drama, and affirming the uselessness of wrestling with it; the latter courageous, virile, tragic, but not pessimistic, for whom the drama of life is not a subject for lamentation, but a problem to be mastered. Beethoven is the hero, Tchaikovsky the incarnation of grief, the feminine nature. The one has a festal or heroic, the other a dejected, every-day outlook on the world. Tchaikovsky is a true poet of the week-day, and hence, perhaps, his compositions have so subjugated the Russian intelligentsia—flesh of whose flesh he was—an intelligentsia refined, profound, and extremely sensitive, but neurasthenically weak-willed and submissive. Beethoven, in his fifth Symphony, in 'Leonora,' in the heroic outlines of his Symphonies, hurls defiance at his truly terrible and tragic fate; Tchaikovsky, humbly and with a sort of voluptuous terror of despair, submits to destiny—in the poem 'Fatum,' in 'Romeo' and 'Francesca,' in the fourth Symphony with the fanfares representing the voices of Fate, and in the sixth Symphony. In his contemplation of the majesty and unconquerableness of Fate there is not merely an excessive dread—there is actually something approaching reverence, a sacred awe and a delight born of that awe. In this submissiveness and dejection, in this absence of protest, of a 'will to protest,' in this sense of doom, do we not see something far more characteristic of the Russian national feeling than in the abstract and formal outlines of melodies borrowed from the folk-repertory for the benefit of the European? Tchaikovsky is a Russian composer by virtue of the quality which makes Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, or even Turgenev Russian writers; he has most of all in common with the gentle and somewhat Europeanised contours of Turgenev's psychology, and with the profound and organic pessimism of that writer's outlook.

* Kuchkist = Nationalist. The little band (Kuchka), known in France as 'Les Cinq,' the five composers, Balakirev, Borodin, Cui, Mussorgsky, and Rimsky-Korsakov, who founded the Russian National School.—(S.W.P.)

Beethoven considered that music should 'strike fire from the soul' and fortify it in Spartan, stoical, manly feelings, but for the feminine Russian soul of Tchaikovsky music is a fountain of tears, disclosed by the hand of genius as a solitary source of alleviation. Every European may not thoroughly understand this typically Russian (and perhaps European as well, but now outlived) exaltation of tears and grief, this desire for self-torment, the acceptance of sorrow as a sort of negative of enjoyment. Tchaikovsky's music is powerful, but its power is of a different order and tendency from that of Beethoven. It is the power of human grief revealed by the magic of a musical genius, and not the power of the spirit resisting the magic of the world and Fate.

The Russian musical soul has two faces. The music of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov responds to one of them—to the contemplative, descriptive, meditative visage. Tchaikovsky's music answers to the other—the visage of anguish and personal, individual sorrow, the cries and lamentations of a soul abandoned and lonely in the universe and powerless to struggle with the forces of the world. The Russian psychology is either melancholy, pessimistic, sorrowful, or turbulent, audacious, and ruffianly. In it exist side by side the most tender, lyrical, intimate feeling, and a savage insolence; but neither is characteristic of it, and both are consequences. What is characteristic is the immemorial, indestructible scepticism, the disbelief in anything—neither in principles and their domination of the world, nor in the moral law, nor in human powers (hence the weakness and 'non-resistance' typical of Tchaikovsky's music and resembling Tolstoy's 'non-resistance to evil'), nor in Divine justice. The Russian soul is 'forsaken in the world of the soul,' and therein consists its tragedy—it feels that it has no home. The world is for it a prison-house, a hunting-box, an inn, but never its own home, created by love and labour. Hence these strange transitions—painful to the moral ear of the European—from profound piety to impiety, from a tender lyrical feeling to insolence and aimless, self-satisfied barbarism; hence the organic disbelief in principles, the anarchism of thought and feeling, the anarchy in the principles of art, the permanent revolution. The European, with his belief in the forces of humanity, of progress, and of the Divine justice which dictates laws to the world, or in moral principles, seems to the typical sceptical Russian a naïve sort of being. In this sense Tchaikovsky, too, is Russian—the irreligiousness of the intelligentsia is characteristic of him. He, too, is a sceptic, believing in nothing whatever, and the world is terrible to him, and inexplicable, as an aggregation of evil and hostile forces: this unbeneficent world, he does not know who rules it after all. The problem of Fate and Death always confronted the intellectual and moral gaze of Tchaikovsky, causing him to tremble and at the same time to strive to hasten the insoluble end. There is some foundation for the legend that he did not die of cholera (the official version), but committed suicide in one of the fits of profound melancholia to which he was subject.

Tchaikovsky's gentle and refined moral traits saved him from the other pole of the Russian temperament—he did not become a barbarian, nor did he descend to vulgarity or savagery. The only sign in his music of the Russian unrestraint is the complete revelation of himself, the baring of his soul in a sort of musical general confession, which no other European has ever deemed necessary. It is this revelation of his soul in his creative work which made Tchaikovsky a genius, but it also made the creative process an intolerable torment to him.

Unassuming and extremely shy by nature, entirely free from any desire for fame, he found himself in the position of a man who had to come before the world and expose his modest soul. It turned his life into a kind of chronic self-crucifixion in public, and was still more destructive to the coherency of his psychology.

The name of Tchaikovsky is now uttered in Europe on a par with those of Beethoven and Brahms—he has become a classic in the symphonic repertory. The years have effaced the external differences between the style of his time and those of the subsequent periods. What seemed to be new and to obscure his work, modest in its outward attributes, has now faded and become dim, and Tchaikovsky alone has flamed like a brilliant star at night. His star is already beginning to eclipse the most serious of his former rivals—the kuchkisty. This is natural, since the exterior aspect of his music is less specific and more European. It was harder for him than for any of the Russian composers to obtain admission to the company of European geniuses, as he had to do it without the assistance afforded by a barbaric setting, modernist forms, and the literary prerequisites of music. Simple, modest, and without any desire to astonish the world, nevertheless he did so, and more profoundly than his rivals and descendants—he, one of the last of the composers to whom were given the genius for melody and the secret of creating the new and the simple. Soon after him came the era of the clever and experienced violators of music, who turned it into a mystical pharmacopœia, a philosophy, a literature, a chess-board, a geometrical problem—music seemed to be exhausted and its sources to be lost. There was a reaction against Tchaikovsky in Russia, as there is now in France—solely due to this clever, rational, intellectual, and æsthetic conception of music. The cold-blooded snobs and æsthetes, ashamed of feeling, and using sounds to hide their feelings—what can they have in common with this strange, naïve, and undiplomatic being, who sincerely and with infinite simplicity uttered everything that he felt, and uttered it with genius? The only thing that was left for them to do—and they did it—was to accuse him of tastelessness. They were right, for sincerity generally borders on tastelessness, just as the very concept of taste, on a closer survey, borders on a defect. The great sensitive musicians, such as Wagner, Beethoven, and Tchaikovsky, on the whole were lacking in taste—that 'strength of the feeble,' that feminine, passive, and formal principle in creative work.

NEW LIGHT ON SCHUBERT:

'It is hard indeed to account for such genius in a man who, with nineteen children, received a maximum sum of $200 a year for their support.'

Prof. G. L. Scherger, at a Schubert Dinner at Chicago.

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

A CENTENARY GROUSE

A wisely-kept Centenary would not outstay its welcome, as that of Schubert seems to have done. The prime mistake was its over-early start. This habit of anticipating things seems to be a feature of modern life. When I was a youngster the preparations for Christmas were concentrated into a gloriously crowded fortnight that was almost as jolly as the festival itself. To-day Christmas numbers of magazines come out in the autumn, and are read and scrapped almost as soon as they appear. Formerly they were published much later, and when bought were laid by in some secret place until Christmas, when we were in the right uncritical mood for their highly-coloured pages and their simple jollities.

Weeks ago, on a mild autumnal day in early November, I passed hosts of people, most of them young enough to know better, with their faces gummed to store windows filled with Christmas toys and fare. How much zest will they be able to pump up by Christmas Day? The present-day talk about Christmas being a bore and so forth is partly a pose, and partly a result of our foolish disregard of the calendar—a disregard that leads those of us who can afford it (and many who can't) to consume fresh strawberries and green peas in mid-winter, and so discount the joys of that first picking of the natural and far superior crop at the right time.

In the same way we began celebrating poor Schubert away back at the beginning of the year, ten months before the actual date of the Centenary. We tried to make 1928 a Schubert year, forgetting that every year is—or should be—a Schubert year. And how did we set about the job? Did we begin to overhaul his output systematically, with a view to discovering neglected treasures? We did not. Instead we took some already over-played works—the 'Unfinished,' the 'Rosamund' Ballet Music, the F minor Impromptu, the Military March in D, and a handful of equally well-worn songs, and proceeded to make them still more threadbare.

But surely the success of a Centenary celebration must be gauged by the extent to which it puts into general circulation such of the composer's efforts as have been undeservedly neglected. This function of the observance is made necessary by a curious blend of caprice and sloth on the part of the musical public. Whether certain works achieve popularity or suffer neglect depends little on their merit. Popularity is often decided by some fortuitous circumstance—an attractive title, association with some outstanding performer, scope for the virtuoso or showman (the terms are almost synonyms), a simplicity that establishes them firmly in the domestic repertory (a stronghold from which they cannot be dislodged), or what not. Relegation to the shelf is almost equally a matter of luck; reverse the aforesaid causes of popularity and you have most of the deciding factors. A Centenary offers the best possible chance—practically the only one—of putting things right, and it must be admitted that both the Beethoven and Schubert opportunities were badly missed.

The other cause, sloth—or perhaps it would be better termed lack of enterprise—is so obvious as to need little more than mention. It is one of the most curious traits of musicians that having discovered a few gems, they should be able to refrain from hunting for further treasures in the same mine. Schubert wrote six hundred songs; for a century average singers and teachers have been content to know about three per cent. of that vast output, and even that tiny proportion was not made up of the undisputed best. Yet one would have thought that their first impulse, on discovering (say) 'Margaret at the Spinning Wheel,' would have been to inquire eagerly as to the other five hundred and ninety-nine from the same pen. (I write this after making all due allowance for the poverty of the early translations, and for the fact that sheer bulk is in itself a kind of impediment; lacking time to inspect so formidable a whole, one is the more ready to be content with a handy album, and to regard it as the cream.) But there is no such excuse in regard to other departments of Schubert's work. For example, we have (rightly) many performances of the A minor and D minor Quartets, but how often do we hear the G major? Every gramophone company has put forth records of the 'Trout' Quintet and of the A minor and D minor Quartets, but I do not recall a single recording of the remarkable G major work. Again, only in the last few years has the C major Symphony had fair treatment. I remember but one solitary performance in my youth, and that was regarded as a kind of daring adventure, on account of the length of the work; and as recently as three or four years ago its revival was a timid one, with liberal cuts. Of all creative artists the composer suffers most from the fatal handicap of dependence on the public performer, and (as we have seen during the recent visit of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra) even on the concert agent. Unperformed plays may be read with little loss—often with gain; and the fact of the general public neglecting a literary masterpiece doesn't hinder the discerning reader from obtaining a copy and enjoying it. But difficult solos and all ensemble works are dead till they are heard.

Having no head for dates I don't know whose centenary comes next. But whoever the composer, it is to be hoped that we shall go to work in a methodical way. Had we done our duty by Schubert we should have proceeded on some such lines as the following: In January last (at the latest) a comprehensive committee would have been formed, representing our chief musical organizations—the Royal Philharmonic Society, the B.M.S., I.S.M., M.T.A., B.B.C., R.A.M., R.C.M., I.S.O., &c., the Board of Education, the Music Publishers' Association, the chief gramophone concerns, and including also three or four of our leading conductors. Sub-committees would have been appointed to overhaul the various branches of Schubert's work, in order to report as to such neglected examples as were worthy of rescue—especially among the songs. The publication of those approved by the committee should have been arranged (with translations of all vocal items). Their public performance (in conjunction with familiar and popular examples in order to ensure good audiences) and their issue per gramophone records and player-piano rolls, would also have been taken in hand. A press sub-committee would have attended to the publicity. In teaching institutions, from the purely musical down to elementary schools, the ground would also have been prepared. The Centenary concerts would have commenced in October, reaching their climax in the middle of November.

The result of this would have been such an appraisement of the composer as has never yet been possible, and the addition to the repertory of much that has not hitherto had a fair hearing, and that (it is to be feared) never will, the chance having been missed. For centenaries never leave things as they were; they are bound to have one of two results, leading either to a boom or a slump. In order to ensure a boom we must show the general public that the proportion of Schubertian successes is greater than it had appeared to be; to incur a slump we have only to harp on the already familiar, plus some unfamiliar things chosen more or less at random. For example, we do no good to Schubert by reviving (as we did recently in London) a poor opera that merely shows his weakness in that line; or Pianoforte Sonatas that make us wish he had left the form alone in favour of the 'Moments Musicaux' and Impromptu type. And our concern with the Sonatas should be less with those dull, long-winded first movements than with the capital Scherzos and other detachable plums.

When we have our Government Department of Fine Arts these things will be put right; until then (musicians being the world's worst organizers and team-workers) we shall continue to make a hash of them.

The most elaborately organized of all the celebrations seems to have taken place in the United States. Activities were wisely concentrated on the week beginning November 18. From the New York Herald-Tribune I take some statistics that will not only interest readers but probably make them gasp as well. More than two thousand cities formed committees, representative of religious organizations, schools, municipality, industry, art, music clubs, conservatories, radio, and theatres. Altogether the number of folk taking part in this national salute to Schubert is calculated to have been more than three millions. A good move was the adoption of a piece of music to be used everywhere as a kind of official tribute, the choice falling on the Adagio from the Quintet in C.

All the chief fraternal and civic organizations lent a hand—the Elks, Masons, Red Men, Rotary, Lions, Kiwanas, Foresters—in fact, the only body not mentioned in this connection seems to be the Klu Klux Klan.

It must have been a great occasion for the Babbitts, for 1,315 Chambers of Commerce raised voices and glasses to the hero of the hour. Every music club, and hundreds of other cultural bodies, held 'centennial exercises'; the leading colleges and conservatories planned special programmes; over a hundred thousand elementary schools led up to the great 'do' with 'special Schubert programmes in the school auditoriums, at which Schubert music was performed by the children and the centennial oration, written by Prof. Daniel Gregory Mason, of Columbia University, was read.' Nor were the churches indifferent. They 'designated Sunday, November 18, as Schubert Sunday,' their organists prepared special Schubert programmes, and 'many ministers delivered a talk on the spiritual message of Schubert's works.' Hundreds of municipalities held 'official exercises, at which the Mayor or his representative delivered a civic address and appropriate Schubert music was played.' And, finally, 'thousands of libraries planned exhibits of Schubert material, facsimiles of his manuscripts . . . and other human interest material.'

Compared with this the celebrations in the rest of the world seem meagre and tame. But the formidable statistics I have quoted leave one with misgivings. If we on this side got a bit tired of the Centenary, what must have been the feelings of the Elks, Red Men, and their fellows in those two thousand celebrating cities, with their 'official exercises and civic addresses'? And I find that, after all, I have forgotten one of the most resounding items:

> 'The Governors of forty-eight States and the Mayors of the hundred leading cities of America issued proclamations on the civic importance of the observance of Schubert Week.'

Not a doubt of it: when Uncle Jonathan finds anything to celebrate he does it with both hands. Yet how ill all this sorts with the personality of the man thus honoured! For a Wagner Centenary—yes; but the appropriate method for Schubert would be something modest and semi-private, however widespread—a multitude of little gatherings of devotees, maybe partaking of a simple meal (not without beer), preceded and followed by some of his choicest music, with ample time for talk (not Centennial Orations), the whole duly mellowed with a haze from incense-breathing pipes. Over such meetings the manes of Schubert might have hovered with the satisfaction of one who feels quite at home. But £2,000 Prize Symphonies, lavish banquets, mayoral Proclamations! . . . No; it is all well-meant, but mistaken. Our sense of values has changed, and for the worse. An age that assesses even the things of the spirit in terms of cash and head-counting can no more celebrate a Schubert fitly than it could produce one.

P.S.—I am obliged—in fact, delighted—by the receipt of the following letter:

> 'Burns Cottage,
> 'Drumtochty Road, Dunoon.
> 'DEAR SIR,—In your article of last month you speak of the youthful pianist who indulged in chewing gum while playing in a competition because (she said) it gave her pluck. You then added, "I pass the useful tip on to nervous singers." Surely, Sir, this was an oversight on your part. A very brief experiment, during a recent musical evening at the Manse, showed that however valuable the use of the gum may be to pianists (and, no doubt, to all other instrumental performers save such as play on wood-wind and brass), it is an actual hindrance to the singer, especially to such as are nervous. The simultaneous use of the muscles involved in chewing and those concerned in the production of vocal tone is practically impossible.
> 'Yours faithfully,
> 'ALEXANDER MCTAGGART.'

Mr. McTaggart is right, and I can only apologise for the slip. I cannot explain it.

NEW LIGHT ON LATE TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

XXXIX.—EDWARD PEARCE

If only by reason of his position as organist and Master of the Choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral, and the choir-trainer of many important composers (e.g., Thomas Ravenscroft), the name of Edward Pearce deserves inclusion in the present series. The surname of this Tudor composer is variously written Peers, Piers, and Pearce, and he first appears as a musician in 1588, when he applied for a post in the Chapel Royal. It is safe, therefore, to assume that he was born in the year 1565, as he was a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral under Westcote, also taking part in the boys' plays between the years 1575 and 1582.

From the Cheque Book of the Chapel Royal we learn that Edward Pearce was sworn a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal on March 16, $158\frac{8}{9}$. Ten years later he was appointed organist and choir director of St. Paul's, but it is incorrect to assume, as has frequently been done, that he resigned his Chapel Royal appointment in 1598. No doubt he could not continue an active member, but it is equally certain that he retained the post, for in 1603 he received livery for the funeral of Queen Elizabeth, as 'one of the Gentlemen extraordinary,' a fact that is explicitly stated in the Lord Chamberlain's Accounts, vol. 554, as quoted in the 'King's Musick'* (1909).

An interesting event occurred in December, 1599, namely, the re-opening of St. Paul's Playhouse in Blackfriars, after a lapse of almost ten years, and, of course, Pearce was in command of the boys. From Ravenscroft's 'Brief Discourse' (1614) one gathers some information as to Pearce, and I quote the pertinent passage from the Introduction:

> 'Maister Edward Pearce the first, sometime Maister of the Children of Saint Paule's in London, and there my Maister, a man of singular eminency in his Profession, both in the Educating of Children for the Ordering of the Voyce, so as the Quality might afterward credit him and preferre them; And also in those his Compositions to the Lute, whereof the world enjoyes many (as from the Maister of that Instrument) together with his skilfull instructions for other Instruments too, as his fruits can beare him witnesse.'

Pearce had ample opportunities for displaying his great powers in many capacities during the eight years he was the producer of the boys' plays at St. Paul's Singing School, from December, 1599, to December, 1607. That he composed incidental music for many of the plays is beyond doubt, and Mr. W. J. Lawrence points out that he 'provided vocal settings for some of the new pieces,' and that 'his music for a song in "Blurt Master Constable" is still extant.' Moreover, 'his solicitude for the advancement of his pupils seems to have urged him to foster the gift of any boy whom he found trying his hand at composition; and what greater delight could a musical prodigy have than to hear his music rendered on the stage?'

Pearce was paid for a Court play given by the boys of St. Paul's on January 1, $160\frac{0}{1}$. According to Prof. Joseph Quincy Adams, in his excellent 'Life of William Shakespeare' (1923), the St. Paul's boys gained great favour at this period, and had the advantage of having plays written for them by John Marston and Thomas Dekker, 'competing, in a limited way, with the Chamberlain's and Admiral's companies.' This rivalry is plainly noticed in 'Jack Drum's Entertainment' (1600):

> 'I saw the Children of Paul's last night,
> And troth, they pleased me pretty, pretty well.
> The apes in time will do it handsomely.'

Adams continues:

> 'And they did. Paul's Playhouse became very fashionable with gentlemen, who were willing to pay the higher prices charged in order to escape the noisy rabble that haunted the public theatres:
> '"I' faith, I like the audience that frequenteth there
> With much applause. A man shall not be choak't
> With the stench of garlic, nor be pasted
> To the barmy jacket of a beer-brewer."'

But a more serious rivalry to the adult actors, including Shakespeare's company, was the establishment of 'private' performances by the Children of Queen's Chapel; and we learn that on September 2, 1600, Henry Evans obtained from Richard Burbage a lease of the Blackfriars Theatre for twenty-one years, Nathaniel Gyles looking after the musical department. These Children of the Chapel with Royal favour captured the public taste in 1601, and had plays written for them by George Chapman and Ben Jonson—the latter, indeed, writing a beautiful elegy on the death of one of the choir-boys, Salathiel Pavy, who acted old men's parts inimitably. Shakespeare himself alludes to the popularity of the child-actors both of St. Paul's (under Pearce) and of the Chapel Royal (under Gyles)—'an aerie of children, little eyases that cry out on the top of question, and are most tyrannically clapped for it: these are now the fashion.'

It is well known, of course, that Marston, in 'Jack Drum's Entertainment' (1601), presented by the St. Paul's boys, unfavourably showed up Jonson, and mentioned himself as 'the new poet Mellidus.' Some time afterwards Marston, in his 'What you will,' replied to Jonson's 'Cynthia's Revels,' 'making,' as Prof. Wallace writes, 'some of Jonson's features unpleasantly prominent in Lampatho, and himself assuming the better traits of "squareness" in Quadratus.' Dekker also, one of the St. Paul's playwrights, launched out at Jonson in 'Satiromastix, or the Untrussing of the Humorous Poet,' and, to make matters worse, it was arranged that Dekker's play should be acted simultaneously by the choir-boys of St. Paul's and by the Lord Chamberlain's men at the Globe.

Among the Add. MSS. at the British Museum (10,444) there is the music score of Edward Pearce's Masque. However, the plays produced by the St. Paul's boys in the period 1599-1609 had music, some of which was furnished by Pearce. In Marston's 'Malcontent' there is much music and dancing, although when this play was taken over by the Burbage Company the music was cut out. In 1607, Shakespeare's company paid Pearce £20 a year to have his boys cease acting. It is probable that he died in 1609 or 1610. He was certainly Master of the Choristers and Almoner in October, 1607.* He contributed two pieces to Ravenscroft's 'Brief Discourse,' a work which was evidently written in 1607, though not published until 1614 (Add. MSS., Brit. Mus., 19,758).

[Among the papers left by the late Dr. Grattan Flood were the above and two other articles on 'Late Tudor Composers,' addressed to the Editor of this journal. They probably mark the completion of the task which the author had carried through with so much erudition.—EDITOR.]

THE SCHOOL OF ENGLISH CHURCH MUSIC

When this project was launched just a year ago there was a tendency to shake heads (we shook ours), and to express the view that nothing would come of it for a very long time. The pessimists were not unjustified. Times are bad and money is tight. Money generally is tight when serious music is the object, but just now it seems tighter than ever. Moreover, schemes for the betterment of Church music usually come to little, owing to the inertia of the parties directly concerned, both clerical and lay. It is, therefore, a pleasant surprise to hear for once in a way of a scheme that is very much alive: the School has already a local habitation and a name, and preparations for active work are well on the way.

The College of St. Nicolas—for so the School will be called—is situated in one of the most delightful districts of Kent. A well-wisher has purchased the freehold of a large modern country house at Chislehurst, very conveniently situated, three stations being within about ten minutes' walk—Chislehurst and Elmstead Woods (for Charing Cross) and Bickley (for Victoria). The College stands high, in eleven acres of beautiful grounds, and commanding a prospect that makes the observer inclined to disbelieve that London is only ten miles off. The property includes a small farm, a couple of cottages, woods, extensive gardens, a well-stocked orchard, a tennis court—everything, in fact, that one looks for in a well-appointed large country residence. The house is about thirty years old, and in an excellent state of repair. Our illustrations give an idea of its handsome exterior and of the surroundings; the interior is, at the moment, not in a photographable state.

We have taken an early opportunity of visiting the College, and of obtaining from Dr. Sydney Nicholson, the Warden, some details concerning its plans.

THE CHOIR SCHOOL

A more or less permanent choir being a necessity in an institution of this kind, we asked Dr. Nicholson what arrangements had been made.

'A Choir School has been founded,' he replied, 'thanks to the generosity of Mrs. E. B. Wright, who is giving it as a memorial to the late Rev. Harold Hall Wright, who was Precentor at Chester Cathedral. At first we had intended accommodating the choristers in one of the smaller buildings in the grounds, but we have since decided that this house will be more suitable for the purpose of a students' hostel; the boys will, therefore, live in the main building. There will be about a dozen; they will sing two daily services in the Chapel, receive board, lodging, and music lessons in the College, and go to Bickley Hall for general education and games.'

Bickley Hall is a first-class preparatory school close by, the heads being the brothers Farnfield. (Are there any footballers of twenty years ago to whom the name of Farnfield is unknown?)

We asked as to what progress had been made in forming the choir.

'The nucleus already exists,' replied the Warden. 'As the Choir School at Clumber, the Duke of Newcastle's seat, was being disbanded, we have arranged for some of the boys to be transferred to us. The entire equipment of the Clumber School has also been handed over to us, so we have had no difficulty and very little expense in starting this part of our organization. We still have a few vacancies, which will be filled pretty soon, as likely boys continue to present themselves for trial. The supply ought to be maintained easily, for we offer exceptional advantages. Think of it! Parents pay a mere ten guineas a term for board and lodging, school fees, private lessons in pianoforte and violin, medical attendance, and laundry. Holidays will be ample—sixteen clear days at Christmas (including Christmas and New Year's Days), twelve days at Eastertide, and at least thirty days (including four Sundays) in August or September. The summer holidays will be so arranged that the boys will not all be away together, as it is important to maintain the Chapel services during that period, when no doubt there will be a good many students taking short-course terms.'

'As to the Chapel?' we inquired.

'For a proper building we must wait. There is an excellent site in the grounds, and we hope that in due time some benefactor will fill it. Until then we shall convert a large and very suitable room into a temporary chapel. A two-manual Hill organ has been presented by Mrs. Cleverly, of Wallington, and Messrs. Harrison & Harrison are rebuilding it and installing it, free of charge.'

'Will the services be of the Cathedral type?'

'They will be of all types. We shall alternate Cathedral music, plainsong, ancient and modern polyphony, simple harmony, and congregational unison. We shall tie ourselves to no period or school; the only uniformity we shall aim at is uniformity in quality—it will all be the best of its kind, we hope. And as certain types of music go hand-in-hand with certain degrees and kinds of ritual, we shall be similarly wide in our use of ceremonial, the services ranging from plain to elaborate. In fact, we are laying ourselves out to be of use to those responsible for the conduct of every type of liturgical service that is in conformity with the very comprehensive Anglican Establishment. On the musical side, nobody need be afraid of meeting anything faddy or cranky or 'precious' here. We shall be as keen about the best of the Victorians as about the best of the Elizabethans.'

'How will the adult part of the choir be supplied?'

'We shall look to our resident staff, and the students, pupils, and visitors for our altos, tenors, and basses. Active participation in the service-music will be a part of the routine, and one that will be of great benefit to the students. This is, perhaps, a suitable moment to mention that we shall endeavour to do missionary work on Sundays, when there will usually be no service after an early morning one. The work of the touring choir I organized a few years ago was so much appreciated that I shall try to do something of the kind with the College choir, or a portion of it.'

'One thing, by the way, I am anxious to be able to do—that is, to have the whole of the Psalter recited during each month. I feel that the present easy-going way of choosing over and over again a few popular Psalms—which happen also to be short!—is a real loss. We shall try to work out a system which will avoid that, without on the other hand leading to over-long services.'

During this conversation we had been inspecting the portion of the College that will be allotted to the choristers. These quarters are so convenient that hardly any structural alteration will be needed. Had the house been designed for the purpose of a college or choir school the arrangements could hardly have been better.

THE STUDENTS' HOSTEL

We next proceeded to the buildings that will become the Hostel for students. Here will be sleeping accommodation for about a dozen students at first, but if the need for extension arises, the site makes such extension easy.

Students will have the use of the College dining and common rooms, library, billiard room, and, of course, the grounds. There will be about half a dozen small studios or practising rooms.

PUPILS' COURSES

'Pupils' courses will be a very important part of the College work,' said the Warden. 'More and more the organ-playing and choir-training in smaller parish churches must necessarily be done by those who are engaged in business or in various kinds of non-musical professional work. The Pupils' Course has been specially designed for these. The lectures and classes will take place mainly in the evenings, and some of them at least will be conducted in a City church or hall, in order to meet the convenience of pupils engaged in business. There will be no fixed time for commencing these courses, but they will be open only to such as show a reasonable proficiency in organ-playing, and, naturally, pupils must undertake to attend for such a length of time as will justify their admission.'

STUDENTS' COURSES

The syllabus for students is designed mainly for those who intend to become professional choirmasters and organists. It will extend over a year of three terms, each approximately of twelve weeks, the terms coinciding so far as possible with those of the R.A.M. and R.C.M. It will be possible for students to combine attendance at the complete course with their regular work at those institutions. The lectures will be arranged roughly in two parallel series, historical and technical. There will be twelve subjects, two being taken in each half-term, and the course will commence in the autumn term of each year. The detailed syllabus may be had on application to the Secretary.

VISITORS' COURSES

'We are also arranging for short terms of instruction for the benefit of choirmasters (amateur or professional), clergy, and ordinands. In special cases we hope to be able to arrange for courses of instruction to visiting choir-boys. There will usually be accommodation for a few pupils or visitors at the Guest House or at the Hostel.'

NO DIPLOMAS

'Please assure your readers that the College will not add to the flowing tide of diplomas and other academic distinctions. The utmost in this direction will be the issue of a mere certificate to a student, pupil, or visitor on completing a course, stating exactly what studies have been taken, with a rider as to the degree of efficiency attained.'

THE COST

The inevitable question of fees cropped up.

'They have been fixed as low as possible,' said Dr. Nicholson. 'For example, a student who lived here would pay 2½ to 3½ guineas a week, according to the accommodation he required. To live in such surroundings as these at about the same rate as would be paid for board and lodging in London is in itself a boon. When you consider that the amount charged also covers the cost of the course of instruction it will be agreed that the proposition is a very attractive one. Students who are non-resident will pay five guineas per term. Resident pupils will pay the same as resident students, and for non-resident pupils the fee will be three guineas a term. The other charges for visitors are on a similarly low scale.'

OUTSIDE WORK

The activities of the College are not to be confined to its four walls.

'Here the system of membership comes in,' said Dr. Nicholson. 'We want all Church choirs to become affiliated. The big ones may not need our help, but we need theirs, because their support will enable us to lend a hand in quarters where our help is required. This help may be merely advisory, or it may take the form of a visit from one of the College staff for the purpose of giving a lecture, conducting a hymn festival, or what not. In spite of the usual slowness of people in taking up a new idea, I am glad to say that choirs are becoming affiliated at an encouraging rate. As soon as possible we shall work out a system of areas, so that a number of parishes conveniently placed can combine in a kind of Church music crusade lasting several days, and directed by a Commissioner from the College. Obviously we can't send a man to the other end of the country for one lecture. Moreover, the grouping and concentrating of a number of parishes develops enthusiasm. The whole of such a little crusade might well end with a festival service for which congregations as well as choirs had been prepared. But it is, of course, for the people on the spot to decide the shape in which our help is to be given. And please make it clear that we don't intend to butt in and give advice where it isn't wanted. We are not a mere critical or interfering body; we go nowhere except by invitation. But I shall be surprised and disappointed if this outside work does not develop, because it enables the smallest and poorest of parishes to derive benefit. Their clergy and organists cannot come to us, so we welcome the chance of going to them. It will cost them nothing but their annual subscription (£1), hospitality for the College lecturer, and a little trouble in organization. Another way in which we hope to be able to reach a wide public is by means of the gramophone. One of the leading companies has promised to make records of various kinds of work done by the College staff. Another point you may find worth mentioning. Already we are receiving frequent applications for organists. At present, of course, we can do nothing in the way of supplying such needs. But the fact of such inquiries beginning so early, before we have actually got to work, shows that eventually a course of study at the College will have the additional advantage of helping a man to obtain a post. The College will, in fact, become a kind of employment agency. We are not anxious to take on much responsibility of that kind, but naturally it will be a help to the standing of the institution if it comes to be recognised as a reliable means of bringing together those who have posts to fill and those who are anxious to fill them.'

We left the College more than ever convinced that here is a really practical and comprehensive means of carrying out a host of ideas that have been talked about for years past. All that remains now is for clergy, organists, and congregations to bestir themselves and take full advantage of it.

VIENNA'S SCHUBERT FESTIVAL

By Paul Bechert

In a period bent on music festivals and centenary commemorations, the Schubert Festival, like its predecessor in the name of Beethoven, was the signal for a series of festivities so copious and satiating as almost to cause an effect quite unwanted in this connection. One longs, after this strenuous Festival, to put Schubert out of mind, and is inclined to adopt the advice of a musician who, having gone through the Beethoven celebrations of last year, advocated a 'non-Beethoven year' as the one befitting homage to the master's genius.

Naturally, the determination to honour Schubert was nowhere more grim and uncompromising than at Vienna. National allegiance and the general Viennese inclination for festivities combined in a campaign of particular intensity, surpassing even the Beethoven ceremonies of last year. The feelings which Vienna cherishes for Franz Schubert are by nature some degrees more fervent than their admiration for Beethoven. The older, and perhaps greater, master, is more admired, regarded with more awe and respect, as a figure of superhuman grandeur; a monument of his own self. Schubert is closer to the heart and intellect of the people, a figure not of Olympus but of the Viennese forest, familiar to and beloved by the Man in the Street. It is interesting, but not thoroughly edifying, to go to the source of this almost fatal popularity. When all is said, it is not Schubert's music in its original shape that has so endeared him to the broad masses, but rather the devices of those cleverly speculative, royalty-hungry operetta-writers who have compiled Schubert's charming melodies into musical comedy concoctions and, to complete the 'popular appeal,' have placed Schubert himself on the stage in the shape of a simple-minded, almost childish tenor lover, rotund of appearance, modest in intellectual forces, and chiefly occupied with making love, enjoying culinary exertions, and composing his 'Unfinished' Symphony.

The Schubert Centenary Festival, giving a survey of a rich musical creation, should above all have served to destroy such popularly tainted misconceptions of one of humanity's greatest geniuses. To see musicians and musicologists entangled in such prejudices was one of the painful incidents of the Festival. It seems barely possible that a scientist elected to the lofty post of head of the Vienna University's music department, Dr. Robert Lach, should choose an official Schubert celebration as the scene for the airing of such views as we heard from him. That Schubert was a mediocre composer, musically imperfect, in technique a dilettante, morally debased and ethically defective, a composer of insufficient mental and artistic equipment, lacking in formal craftsmanship as well as morals, a parasite and ne'er-do-well, and a self-satisfied Philistine and petit-bourgeois as well: this is the opinion of one who has formed his judgment not from knowledge of Schubert's work, but from familiarity with the so-called Schubert biographies which the operetta theatres have bestowed upon us for ten years past. To air such views at this moment, however, and at a Schubert festivity, was a deplorable and tactless offence.

Let us pass from this painful incident to what was otherwise a dignified and nation-wide homage to one of the greatest and surely the most popularly beloved of all Austrian classic composers. The inhabitants of the city where Schubert lived and starved, ignored while among us save by a small circle of friends, united in a sweeping demonstration to atone for errors committed a hundred years ago. The Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vienna's (and probably Europe's) oldest musical society, once rejected the dedication of Schubert's C major Symphony as a work unworthy of performance and much too long. What pride to the humble composer could he have heard it played now, in the hall of the same society, by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Furtwängler, in the most perfect manner possible!

The celebration even brought the realisation of Franz Schubert's greatest dream. He was honoured as a composer of operas. This was, perhaps, the lasting achievement of Vienna's Festival. A triple bill comprised 'The Twin Brothers,' 'Rosamunde,' and 'The Conspirators' (or 'The Domestic War,' as the all-too-cautious Imperial censor, fearful of 'revolutionary associations,' called it in 1861). This little work has a naïve story not devoid of homely humour and some charming though none too theatrically effective music of the sort that surely ought to have pleased Vienna when the popularity of Rossini was at its height.

'The Twin Brothers,' originally billed as a 'farce with music,' is amusing enough, and contradicts those who denied Schubert's capacity to write for the theatre. A more grateful part could not be desired by any operatic star of our day than the double rôle of the twin brothers of such warring dispositions. Moreover, the music is very melodious, though a contemporary critic referred to it, in the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, as unsingable, over-orchestrated, and laboriously searching for originality—all of which sounds very familiar to modern ears in connection with Schönberg, Stravinsky, Alban Berg, and, on occasion, even Richard Strauss.

'Rosamunde,' also, another of Schubert's children of sorrow, was reinstated into theatrical honours that evening, though minus the weak libretto by Wilhelmine von Chézy, which helped to cut short the career of the opera. Robert Heger hit upon the ingenious plan of collating this beautiful 'absolute' music as a series of dance pieces, and Sascha Leontjeff, the Vienna Opera's new maître de ballet, devised an attractive choreographic scenario and handsomely displayed it amid black draperies and varying light.

Innumerable concerts of Schubert music, of course, swept over our heads during the Festival week, some of them interesting and many not worthy of mention. Thousands of people attended the ceremonies before the Schubert monuments and memorials so copiously scattered over the city and its suburbs, and for a charming serenade of Vienna's school-children before Schubert's dwelling-place in Nussdorferstrasse. Tens of thousands flocked to see Vienna's City Hall lit up with solemn electric illuminations in honour of the composer; and in the presence of many officials and foreign guests (among them the mayors of many important German cities) Vienna's proverbial love of celebrations and mass manifestations once again held full sway, and the city honoured herself by doing honour to one of her greatest geniuses.

Music in the Foreign Press

RAMEAU ON EXPRESSION AND INTERPRETATION

In the November Guide Musical et Théâtral (a new little monthly now published as a supplement to the Guide du Concert, Paris), Eugène Borrel quotes a number of remarks in Rameau's 'Observations sur notre instinct pour la musique' (1754) and 'Code de musique pratique' (1760). These refer especially to the effects of harmonic contrasts in Lulli's 'Armide.' They are very instructive on the matter of the significance ascribed in his time to tonality and modulations in their relation to the dramatic text. For instance, referring to Armide's monologue, 'Le charme du sommeil le livre à ma vengeance,' Rameau writes:

> 'This monologue begins in E minor, and modulates to G major to emphasise the epithets by which Armide characterises her hero. Then, to express her feeling as to the accident (i.e., sleep) which places him in her power, comes a G sharp leading to the minor subdominant, A minor. But it is in the main key that she sings the words, "Je vais percer son invincible cœur." If these were harmonized—as they could be quite easily—in G major, the impression conveyed would be wholly contrary to the meaning of the words.'

ROUSSEL ON ATONALITY AND POLYTONALITY

The October Nouvelle Revue Musicale reprints an interview with Albert Roussel published last summer in Le Guide du Concert, in which the following statements occur:

> 'I consider that there is no future for atonality. The notion implies its own limitations and contains the germ of its own decay. An atonal work of any appreciable length becomes monotonous, and even intolerable. It is to the play of tonalities that music owes its changing aspects, its movement. Polytonality does not exclude this play, and therefore strikes me as unobjectionable in principle. Certain young composers have derived very fine effects from its use. But it is a purely empirical and, so to speak, intermittent resource. Its technique has not yet come into being. Besides, there is no such thing as absolute polytonality, no work that is polytonal from beginning to end. A good deal of the music described as polytonal actually remains within the scope of traditional harmony.'

IS QUARTER-TONE MUSIC POSSIBLE?

In the November Melos, Alfred Gutmann writes:

> 'Experiments conducted by Profs. Karl L. Schäffer, Carl Stumpf, E. von Hornbostel, and myself (described in the Zeitschrift für Psychologie und Physiologie der Sinnesorganen, 1903) show that there is a great difference in the power of the human ear to differentiate sounds very slightly different in pitch when these sounds are heard together and when they are heard consecutively. In the latter case, the ear is able to perceive differences as small as 0.05 per cent. But it goes otherwise when two notes are heard together; in the lowest regions of tone, variations in pitch amounting to nearly ten per cent. remain undetected, and in the highest, the difference, to be perceptible, must amount to at least 0.75 per cent. Further experiments have proved, among other things, that neither singers nor violinists are capable of imagining an interval of a quarter-tone definitely enough to strike it correctly. In one case an expert violinist, aiming at a quarter-tone interval, struck one which the registering instrument proved to be a twentieth of a tone. All that can be said of intervals given out as quarter-tones is that they stand somewhere between the unison and the next semitone The only exceptions are provided by instruments giving out notes of automatically fixed pitch, and playing within a limited region of the compass. In other words, a blind alley is soon reached.'

ARNOLD SCHÖNBERG

In the November Rassegna Musicale, G. Pannain writes:

> 'Arnold Schönberg is a musical tormentor and a tormented musician. He has many enemies, of whom the most relentless is himself. The real Schönberg was born of his incapacity to understand himself. Like Brückner, Mahler, and Strauss, he is a survival from the 19th century, a piece of wreckage thrown high up into the air by the explosion of the (musical) revolution, only to fall to the ground. His early works (Opp. 1 to 10) show clearly enough what part he was cast for—that of an imitator. They are instinct with romanticism, and reveal the irreconcilable influences of Brahms and Wagner. In the D minor String Quartet, in "Verklärte Nacht," in "Pelleas and Melisande," in the "Gurrelieder," in the early songs, and in the "Kammersymphonie," not one utterance is to be found which expresses a personal experience. Later, contact with Debussy's music occasioned a violent reaction against the romantic and formalistic tendencies to which he was a slave. This accounts for the character of the "Buch der hängenden Gärten," of "Erwartung," of "Herzensgewächse." In "Pierrot Lunaire" we see Schönberg at his most characteristic; it is the work in which the conflicting elements of his personality seem to reach the highest stage of organization; and it puts the final seal to fifty years of delirium tremens in European art. After having written it, Schönberg could find no way but that of twelve-tone composition, which eventually led to the Wind Quintet. In this, the wholesale application of the twelve-tone system is carried out with incomparable virtuosity. But, in the end, the achievement turns out to be a piece of useless bravery—mere bravado, in fact, going against common sense, feeling, and human capacity for endurance; an act of sterile rebellion.'

The November Revue Musicale contains an important interview with Schönberg by Erwin Stein, on the occasion of the completion of the 'Variationen für Orchester.' Its principal points are:

'If Schönberg has remained so many years without writing for the orchestra, it is because since 1921 he has been experimenting in twelve-tone composition, resorting to small instrumental combinations because he believes in avoiding duplication of notes in octaves. He also believes that the tendency to use small orchestras is gaining ground, and that "nowadays America alone insists on huge orchestras." So long as huge orchestras remain in use, listeners will fail to acquire the desirable aural sensitiveness.'

AN UNKNOWN SKETCH BY SCHUBERT

In the October Musik (a special Schubert number, containing a variety of interesting contributions), Hannes Bauer writes:

'The choral "Gesang der Geister über den Wassern," for male voices—a work whose daring harmonic and modulatory scheme proved sadly baffling for the audience at its first performance on March 7, 1821—was first written in 1817, for four male voices a cappella. In December, 1820, Schubert started a new draft, with pianoforte accompaniment. He had written down a good part of this when he conceived the work in its final form—i.e., for two male choirs with string orchestra (minus the violins). The manuscript of this final version also bears the date December, 1820.'

THE SCHERZO OF SCHUBERT'S PIANOFORTE SONATA IN E MINOR

In the same issue, Adolf Bauer writes:

'In January, 1842, Ferdinand Schubert sold the manuscript of a Pianoforte Sonata by his brother Franz, which consisted of three movements: Moderato (E minor), Allegretto (E major), Scherzo (A flat major), with Trio (D flat major). The first of these movements was published in 1888 by Breitkopf & Härtel, and the second in 1907 by the same firm. The Scherzo and Trio had remained unpublished.'

The movement in question is given in full.

THE UNOBTRUSIVENESS OF D'INDY'S TECHNIQUE

In the daily L'Action Française (quoted in the October Nouvelle Revue Musicale), Dominique Sordet writes:

'I see in d'Indy's works far more than the austere, scientific architecture about which a blindly repeated legend has arisen. Unprejudiced listeners will find his music not algebraical and stiff, but pleasing, unconstrained, and mobile. It is, in fact, almost constantly melodic, brilliantly and attractively scored. I, for one, have never heard any of his best works without marking, with wonder, how very unobtrusive their technical machinery is. The chief merit of d'Indy's technique is, indeed, that it need never be noticed. Inspiration, not formal ingenuity, has the upper hand.'

M.-D. Calvocoressi.

Occasional Notes

Probably the much-advertised Prize Symphony of Kurt Atterberg will, after all, be remembered not for itself but for the discussion that has arisen as to whether it is a genuine work or a hoax. John o' London's Weekly made something of a 'scoop' by publishing in its issue of December 15 a letter from Mr. Atterberg in which he claims that the Symphony was partly a joke, the humour lying in the reminiscent character of much of the material. 'The laugh has been mine,' he says. We are not so sure about that. A hoax doesn't really begin until the hoaxer shows the hoaxees that they have been 'done,' and the sooner he does this the bigger his score. The prize was awarded some months ago, but there was no sign of a gloat from Mr. Atterberg until mid-December, when John o' London's Weekly sent him a batch of press cuttings, among them the Sunday Times article wherein Mr. Ernest Newman, after alluding to the Symphony's indebtedness to other composers, hinted that the whole thing may have been an elaborate bit of leg-pulling. 'If my theory is correct,' added Mr. Newman, 'the laugh is Atterberg's to-day.' Whereupon Mr. Atterberg suddenly breaks his silence, and says, 'Mr. Newman is right—principally . . . and the laugh has been mine.'

Frankly, we have our doubts about the genuineness of a declaration so belated, and made under such circumstances. There was general agreement among the critics as to the lack of originality in the Symphony. Mr. Newman's 'leg-pulling' hypothesis was obviously put forward mainly as a joke, and it probably owed its origin to the fact that in the announcements concerning the award of the prize a good deal had been made of Mr. Atterberg's being a critic. That word 'critic,' we know, is in itself enough to set Mr. Newman's pen going, and his train of thought might have been on some such lines as these: 'So Atterberg is a critic—one of those unhappy wretches doomed to spend weary hours listening to concerts. A dog's life! Still, there may be advantages if a critic is also a composer. Think of the mass of material he must have at the back of his mind ready to help things along when originality fails! No wonder this Prize Symphony is a compilation rather than a composition! I wonder if Atterberg is conscious of this? But even if he is, probably nobody else will be; we have for so long given up expecting anything original. One of these fine days somebody (preferably a critic-composer) ought to write a symphony chock full of "cribs" in order to see how much the public will swallow. I believe he would be able to "get away with it" easily. It wouldn't be a bad joke to suggest that Atterberg has actually done this with his Prize Symphony. In fact (my column having to be duly filled), I'll do it!' And he did it.

Finding the press almost unanimous in condemnation of his Symphony, mainly on the ground of its plagiarism, Mr. Atterberg might well bless Mr. Newman for showing him a way out.

Several points in this affair call for a word. What does Mr. Atterberg mean when he says that Mr. Newman is right 'principally'? A door must be open or shut. (Don't argue that it may be ajar. If it is ajar it is not shut.) Similarly the Symphony was either a hoax or a genuine work. If the former, it shows a curious lack of taste and a perverted sense of humour. A centenary tribute to a universally beloved composer is not a fit medium for elaborate leg-pulling, especially when the puller receives £2,000 for his effort. Mr. Atterberg says 'it is always a ridiculous thing for a composer to take part in competitions,' and he adds that he once sent in two entries for a contest at Stockholm, one serious, the other pour rire; both won prizes. With this in mind he may be anxious to expose the futility of competitions for composers. If so, all he had to do on being informed of his success was to show his hand and decline the prize. Instead, he pouched the prize and allowed the Symphony to be accepted as a genuine work. He would have been wiser, we think, to have gone on saying nothing. Better by far to have written a symphony that was found to be unoriginal than to have placed himself in his present anomalous position.

Too much has been made of the fact of Atterberg's being a critic. Several of the most eminent of composers have also been critics, but their critical activities never hindered them from being original. And does a critic necessarily hear or become acquainted with more music than a composer who has studied deeply? We must distinguish, too, between a critic who composes and a composer who, for a brief period, or at intervals, writes criticisms. It seems to have been too readily taken for granted that Atterberg is first a critic, and a composer a long way after. But this is not so. In the 1926 edition of Paul Frank's 'Tonkünstlerlexikon' he is spoken of merely as a 'Distinguished composer and conductor,' and a brief list of his works is given. In Dent's 'Dictionary of Modern Music and Musicians,' mention is made of his being critic to a Stockholm paper, but the long list of works, and the reference to him as 'one of the most talented of young Swedish composers,' leaves no doubt about his being above all a composer; criticism is no more his main job than it was Berlioz's or Schumann's. In 1922 he had reached his Opus 21, and this by means not of trifles, but of large-scale works. By the by, several writers point out as a suspicious circumstance the fact that, although the Prize Symphony is No. 6, books of reference make no mention of the other five. This is a slip. Both the German and English dictionaries mentioned above credit him with five.

On the whole, the evidence points to the Symphony having been composed entirely—not 'principally'—as a serious effort. If it has failed, the failure is not due to its containing themes that remind us of the classics. Plenty of good works do that. Is there in all symphonic music a more obvious likeness than that between the main theme of the Finale of Brahms's No. 1 and that of the Finale of Beethoven's No. 9? Yet nobody contends that the Brahms is other than a masterpiece. No doubt the critics duly pointed out the resemblance, but evidently Brahms didn't think it mattered, and posterity agrees with him. (Anyway, he didn't pretend that he'd been hoaxing the critics.) The game of hunting for thematic coincidences grows every year less and less worth the candle. The only out-and-out original music written to-day is of the kind that nobody but the composers and their little circle want to hear—for real originality consists less in the thematic bases than in the superstructure raised on them. It is the discourse, not the text, that gives the preacher scope for invention and freshness of thought. Depend upon it, if Atterberg had made the most of his reminiscences they would have mattered no more than the far more glaring Brahms example mentioned above. How much originality of theme or plot is there in Shakespeare? Or in Dickens—except (significantly) when he is at his weakest?

The literary analogy is not perfect, but it is near enough to make Kipling's prologue to 'Barrack-Room Ballads' the best statement of the case for the unimportance of originality in the bases of extended composition of any kind. You remember? How, 'When 'Omer smote 'is bloomin' lyre,' such popular material as seemed likely to be useful, ''e went an' took, the same as me.' The people heard their old stories come back viâ the poet, 'but kep' it quiet, same as you.'

> 'They knew 'e stole; 'e knew they knowed.
> They didn't tell, nor make a fuss,
> But winked at 'Omer down the road,
> An' 'e winked back—the same as us!'

But if 'Omer hadn't done much with the old tales after taking them, he'd have been forgotten long ago.

Short musical themes are now almost as common property as the scale which plays so big a part in most of them. No symphony ever succeeded by virtue of originality in its thematic material, or failed for want of it. The deciding factors are development, style, structure, orchestration, harmony, and rhythm; melodic freshness counts for little unless these other excellences are present. And if they are there in force, they can dispense with thematic freshness.

'Infant Radio Gets Into Long Pants.' This headline in an American musical journal made us sit up; but we subsided on reading the small type paraphrase that formed the sub-title: 'Good music and more of it promised listeners-in this year.' If we may judge from some sample American broadcast programmes, even a fig-leaf would be a notable improvement. It seems a sudden leap from 'nodings' to long pants.

Mr. Herbert Heyner, who is just starting on an American tour, has met with an unusual snag at the start. Engaged to sing at a Syracuse 'Morning Musical' (apparently a function run by ladies), he notified the committee of a change in his programme, the new item being Peter Warlock's 'Good Ale.' Whereupon his agent received the following reply:

> 'In regard to Mr. Heyner's suggestion of substituting "Good Ale" for last number of his program, we will gladly allow the changing providing "Good Ale" is not a drinking song. It sounds like an English drinking song for which there is historic background in England, but none in America.
> 'Please assure Mr. Heyner that we find his program most interesting, quite unlike anything which we have had, and that we are looking forward to it with pleasure. He is free to change program as he pleases, excepting to a drinking song.'

Here is a new basis for the censoring of programmes. If singers have to ascertain whether the country in which they are performing has a historic background for all the goings-on covered by their songs, the stock repertory will become smaller than ever.

The long letter from 'Schubertian' on p. 61 of this issue is an indication of the need for a reliable Schubert biography. One would have expected such a work to be an inevitable product of the Centenary, but it has not appeared—at all events, in English. In the Musical Courier of November 29, Mr. Carl Saerchinger has a long article entitled 'A Bad Book about Schubert,' wherein he shows Mr. Newman Flower's 'Franz Schubert and His Circle' to be inaccurate in many important respects, besides being badly written. Yet the book was well reviewed in this country.

Mr. Saerchinger (who has previously proved himself to be an ardent and well-informed Schubertian) makes out so strong a case against Mr. Flower that we can only assume some favourable English reviews to be due to a lack of knowledge. (This assumption, however, does not account for the lengthy eulogies written by Mr. Ernest Newman and Mr. Francis Toye.) The trouble is that certain very questionable statements in the biographies written by Mr. Flower and Mr. Whitaker-Wilson will be generally accepted, and incorporated in future works of reference. For example, it has always been a matter of doubt as to whether Schubert and Beethoven met. The weight of evidence was against such a meeting having taken place. But both Mr. Flower and Mr. Whitaker-Wilson state without reservation that there were several meetings, and Mr. Whitaker-Wilson even goes so far as to tell us that the two 'sometimes had their evening meal together.' He also gives details of meetings, and tells us that after Beethoven's death, Schubert 'declared that he could clearly remember, word for word, everything that Beethoven had ever said to him'! But no authority is given for this statement.

Again, concerning the 'Unfinished' Symphony Mr. Whitaker-Wilson says, 'Men who (one would imagine) have at least ordinary critical sense have wasted much time, ink, and energy in trying to prove that Schubert said all that it was necessary to say on the themes he enunciated in the only two movements that exist. . . . Nothing is further from the actual truth. The whole matter is capable of the simplest and, it may be added, the most characteristic explanation. Schubert forgot all about it.' But if he 'forgot all about it,' how came he to write sketches of the Scherzo? However, not content with stating categorically and italically as a fact what is, after all, only surmise, Mr. Whitaker-Wilson proceeds to go into details as to how, when, and where Schubert forgot it! If these two Schubert books are samples of the 'brighter' biography, give us the dull. We prefer to go to novels for our fiction.

Mr. Gustav Holst will be travelling abroad from now until Easter. As he will be beyond the convenient reach of the post, he requests that no letters be written to him until his return.

Mr. H. L. Balfour's retirement from the postion of organist and conductor of the Royal Choral Society, after thirty-three years of service, was made the occasion of a warm tribute from the members. At a gathering of nearly a thousand at the Albert Hall on December 10 the Earl of Shaftesbury presented Mr. Balfour with a cheque for £200. 'You have had a good innings,' said his Lordship; 'thirty-three years is a long term of service—almost worthy of a test match.

In his reply Mr. Balfour said that, having reached the age of seventy, he thought a younger man should take his place. He added, 'Lord Shaftesbury referred to cricket. Well, you may be surprised to hear that I made sixty not out last summer.'

We join in the many good wishes to Mr. Balfour on his retirement. We congratulate him, with a touch of envy, on that not out innings, too. In fact, we would be prepared to wager that not many things in the past few years have given Mr. Balfour greater pleasure than those sixty runs.

It is a commonplace that wherever the Briton goes he takes his cricket and other national institutions. Among these is choralism—a form of activity difficult to pursue in some remote quarters of the globe. We have read with interest and pleasure in the East African Standard a report of a performance of 'Elijah' in Kenya, by the Nairobi and District Choral Society, numbering about eighty (sixteen tenors!), with an orchestra of twenty-one (including eight wind). The conductor was Mr. W. Isherwood. All the performers were British save one—Signor Pignoni Aniceto, a double-bassist. The report speaks highly of the performance, especially on the choral side. But the main point is that a well-equipped society should be active in such a part of the Dominions. This was the first performance of 'Elijah' in East Africa. Choralists at home will join us in saluting Mr. Isherwood and his forces.

In a recent issue of the Star, Miss Daisy Kennedy pled for more sensible dress for men, above all for something less starchy in the way of evening clothes. Most musicians will agree with her; but they will be emphatically against her suggestion that male musicians should return to long hair. 'Couldn't those who have hair let it grow just a little bit longer?' asks Miss Kennedy. 'In the old days the musician used to look so much more charming, but now you can't distinguish him from anyone else.' And a good thing too! This change in the matter of hair is very recent, however. When Melsa made his English debut in 1913, his agent, Gorlitz, began a preliminary announcement thus: 'He is twenty years old, and has short hair; nevertheless, in two months' time the whole world will talk of him and his art.' That 'nevertheless' is significant; it would never be written to-day. Our concern now is with the contents of the cranium, not with its covering. When the above-mentioned advertisement concerning Melsa appeared, we ourselves (not unaware of diminishing thatch) wrote for a contemporary a little jingle that may or may not be worth reprinting. Anyway, here it is:

THE LAY OF THE BALD VIOLINIST

'He has short hair!' Gone is the glamour now
Of tangled mane and hyacinthine locks!
To hear a fiddler with a close-cropped brow
The fickle public flocks.

'Sic trans—' You know the tag! When young I
To cultivate the Paderewski mop. [strove
Alas! soon came the barber's fateful words,—
'A little thin on top!'

And now I am as bald as any coot:
(What is a coot? Is it a bird or beast?)
Yet am I holpen, seeing Gorlitz's 'ad.,'
And care not in the least.

For I can leave his Melsa far behind,
My gleaming pate makes his attractions small;
Then come, my Gorlitz, boom me as the man
Who has no hair at all!

Gramophone Notes

BRUNSWICK

Not often will one find a better orchestral record of Mozart than that of the Berlin State Opera Orchestra playing the 'Kleine Nachtmusik,' conducted by Oscar Fried. Perhaps the Minuet—at all events in its opening phrases—seems to stump rather than dance, but the grace of the Trio more than atones. Throughout the clarity and finish are admirable (80036-37).

Excellent, too, are the couple of records of extracts from Manuel de Falla's 'El Amor Brujo,' played by the London Chamber Orchestra under Anthony Bernard. On the first record is 'Dance of Terror,' 'Magic Circle,' 'Midnight,' and 'Ritual Fire Dance'; on the other are the Pantomime, Dance, and Finale. This is fascinating stuff, especially in colour and rhythm, and both performance and reproduction are worthy.

As his own country has no job worth his while, apparently, Alfred Piccaver can sing to his fellow-countrymen only per gramophone. He is recorded in 'Che gelida manina' and 'Addio alla madre.' I doubt if there is a more beautiful tenor voice to be heard to-day. Perfect ease, purity of tone, and a most appealing quality are there—so much so that the total effect of two arias of this somewhat lachrymose type is a bit cloying. I look forward to hearing him in a more robust and heroic vein (50114).

Chamlee and Bonelli are recorded in duets from 'Martha' and 'Forza del destino,' and so long as one is content with music of very slender interest one can enjoy the combined work of two fine voices (50112).

Among a host of light dance music records I mention four that are highly praised by such of my household as dance: 'Lonely little bluebird' and 'Blue Grass,' played and sung by the Vincent Lopez Orchestra (3855), and 'The New Twister' and 'Shim-me-sha-wabble,' in which the culprits are the Original Wolverines. I am surprised to hear that 'Shim-me-sha-wabble' is good for dancing purposes; its crazy sounds and rhythms would induce me to stagger, but no more. Still, I must own to enjoying its queer noises (3856).

The label, '"To Spring," Grieg,' suggests an old friend from the Lyric Pieces. It turns out to be a jazzed version of that work. for pianoforte duet and dance band. All who don't know the original version will enjoy it; those who do will say things in default of being able to throw them. On the other side is Potter's 'Twinketoes'; the slick duettists are Fairchild and Rainger (3848).

H.M.V.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra seems likely to become the most popular recording body on this side of the water, as it probably is on the other. There can be no doubt about its extraordinary efficiency; I have, however, a feeling that both conductor and players are becoming slaves to it. There are European—even English—orchestras whose playing I prefer, despite a technical standard several degrees below that of the Philadelphians. The latest of the American orchestra's records is of the C minor Symphony of Brahms. In the matter of sonority the first and last movements are splendid—even thrilling at times. But the Andante sostenuto and the Allegretto are far too loud—a matter of recording, no doubt, for it is inconceivable that Stokowski should make these two movements fortissimo during long stretches. Anyway, the result is a lack of contrast in the performance as a whole. Needle experts will no doubt tone things down in the middle movements by using some special brand of the hope-I-don't-intrude kind, with soap points; but I refuse to spend time and trouble in making adjustments that ought to be looked after in the recording room. But don't let me put anybody off these records, which are really outstanding save for the fault I have mentioned (D1499-1503).

The Philadelphians are recorded also in Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Czar Sultan' Suite No. 3—vivid, picturesque music, but far too scrappy for satisfaction (D1491).

Beethoven's eighth Symphony gets very nearly full justice from the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Schalk. I say 'very nearly,' because the performance, excellent as it is, still leaves me with the feeling that not all the humour of the music has been brought out. It never is, I think. Perhaps the symphonic label induces too serious an approach. The variety of power in this recording is better than usual.

because there is some really soft playing. I enjoyed this batch very much (D1481-83).

A safe 'winner' should be the record of the 'Tannhäuser' and 'Rakoczy' Marches, played by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Blech—fine, vivid work, and always clear and well-scaled (D1498).

Those for whom Spanish dances still retain glamour will enjoy the three by Granados and Albeniz's 'Triana,' played by the New Light Symphony Orchestra, Goossens conducting (C1553-54).

The chamber music plum this month is Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet in E flat, played by Ossip Gabrilovitsch and the Flonzaley Quartet. Pianoforte tone is first-rate. Why do our soloists as a rule reserve this quality for ensemble works, and switch over to banjos, tin kettles, and auntie's old piano with the pleated silk shirt-front when playing solos? In every respect this Schumann recording is outstanding (DB1191-94).

Rachmaninov is not guiltless in this matter of pianoforte tone in his latest record, yet the performance is so good as to make us overlook the fault. I have never heard so champagne-like a performance of Mendelssohn's so-called 'Bees' Wedding' as he gives us here—whirling pace, absolute clarity, and some astonishing nuance. On the other side, he is heard in—you will never guess!—his own Prelude in C sharp minor (DA996).

Last month Kreisler descended to 'The Rosary'; here he is, still out of his proper sphere, with his own arrangement of 'The old folks at home' and Drdla's hackneyed 'Souvenir.' But why? (DA975).

Heifetz gets a bit farther off the ground with his own version of Ponce's 'Estrellita' and a Drigo-Auer 'Valse Bluette' (DA984). When our pianists of like calibre descend to solos of the quality played by these two violinists we shall be asked to listen to 'The Maiden's Prayer' and the 'Stephanie Gavotte.'

The pick of vocal solo records: D1490 (Maria Olczewska in 'Che faro' and 'Ombra mai fù'); DB1068 (Chaliapin—unexpectedly—in Beethoven: 'In questa tomba,' and Koenemann's 'When the king went forth to war'); and D1506 (Florence Austral, supported with capital effect by the Covent Garden chorus in the 'Inflammatus,' from Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' and 'The night is calm,' from 'The Golden Legend').

A rollicking affair is the record of John Goss and the Cathedral Male-Voice Quartet in some very un-cathedral-like ditties—'The sailor likes his bottle-o,' 'Whisky Johnny,' and three other cheerful shanties (B2381).

A fine chance was missed when Paul Robeson was set to make a record of plantation songs with chorus. The harmonization is of the feeblest, the chorus-singing is poor, and Robeson himself was allowed (or induced) to sing his solos about a fourth too low. Of course he can manage it comfortably, but the effect is monotonous and growly. Is there nobody at headquarters who can instil a little taste and musicianship into the arrangers of this kind of thing? Apparently the job has been left to a vaudeville call-boy with a leaning towards music (C1585).

The choir of Salisbury Cathedral is heard in an extract from Sullivan's 'Light of the World,' and 'He shall feed His flock' from 'The Messiah' (B2814). This is very pure, refined singing, beautifully balanced in the Sullivan piece save for a touch of over-prominent tenor. The Handel air is sung not as a solo, but by a number of boys, with excellent result. A reviewer in a contemporary wonders at this, and seems to question its advisability. Evidently he is unaware that the ensemble of a group of well-trained boys is not only one of the most delightful forms of choralism, but also fairly common. There must, for example, be many people attending the 'St. Matthew' Passion performances at St. Paul's Cathedral to whom the singing of certain of the solos by the pick of the boys is one of the most beautiful features. I hope this Salisbury lead will be followed up. I remember once getting a bigger thrill from the singing of 'Let the bright seraphim' by a large force of boys than any soloist has ever given me.

Finally, from some humorous records I choose for special commendation that of Angela Baddeley in a couple of monologues by A. P. Herbert—'Kate in the call-box' and 'Reducing,' from 'The Trials of Topsy.' Here is first-rate humour admirably handed out (C1581).

COLUMBIA

We take the emotion of Tchaikovsky less seriously now than twenty years ago, but his Symphonies are still able to stand the more critical hearing that has come with time. His invention is not always tip-top—his second subjects usually belong to the salon rather than to the symphonic platform—but his scoring alone is always able to save the situation, with a good bit to spare. The E minor Symphony has been recorded in the Amsterdam Concert-Hall, played by the Concertgebouw under Mengelberg. The climaxes, especially in the Finale, are so fine that only the most jaded and superior person can resist them. I put this set among the month's very best records (L2176).

With it must rank those of 'Petrouchka,' conducted by Stravinsky himself, the players being that vague 'Symphony Orchestra' met with only on gramophone labels. The main point, however, is that they put up a performance hard to beat by any of the internationally famous orchestras that are now at the gramophonist's beck and call. One need not have seen the ballet in order to enjoy this brilliant stuff. If only Stravinsky had gone on growing after 'Petrouchka' . . . ! (L2173-75).

Two other orchestral records no less excellent in their different ways are those of the 'William Tell' Overture, played by the New Queen's Hall Orchestra under Sir Henry Wood (5058-59), and a couple of light works—Alford's 'The Two Imps' and Grunow's 'Dancer of Seville,' played by the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, conducted by Sir Dan Godfrey. In both pieces the brilliant xylophone playing of Messrs. Bennett and Byrne is a feature; it must be heard to be believed (9505).

The Garde Républicaine Band is extraordinarily precise in the Entr'acte from 'Carmen,' but though this is the quality that first strikes the listener, he is soon impressed by others—variety and delicacy especially (9504).

A batch of Chopin Nocturnes, played by Godowsky, rather disappoints me. The tone is not first-rate, and, great man though Godowsky be, I cannot avoid a feeling that he is a trifle casual in some of the performances. Everything is perfect on the technical side, but occasionally comes a phrase so square-cut as to make one sit up in astonishment. There is surely a middle way between this rigidity and the spineless method adopted by many players under the cloak of rubato (L2164-67).

Edouard Commette, whose organ solos were warmly praised last month, has since been recorded in Bach's Fantasia in G minor. His pace is too slow to produce the blend of fire and fantasy that are surely the essence of the piece; and I always feel that the work is incomplete without the fugue, which provides the proper answer and contrast to it (9552).

Two records made in Manchester Cathedral should be noted. One is of the choir singing the carol, 'When the crimson sun had set,' with, for companion piece, Parry's Prelude to the 'Old 104th,' played by Dr. A. W. Wilson (9500); the other gives us 'Angels ever bright and fair,' well sung by Robert D. Peel, and Bach's Prelude on 'Christ our Lord to Jordan came' (9501). The choir sings capitally, the only fault being probably due to the arranger of the carol—the marked difference of pace between verse and refrain. The shorter notes in the latter produce all that is needed in the way of increased animation; the change of pace makes the verse sound too slow by contrast. The organ pieces are successful above the average. In the Bach the chorale tune in the pedal (8-ft.) comes through well, and would make an even better show were the manual registration a little less bright. Some of the top notes are a bit piercing, and suggest 2-ft. pitch rather than the 4-ft. which it probably is. The Parry is the better record of the two. Dr. Wilson takes it at a good, swinging pace—as he does the Bach, by the way; and the tune stands out finely owing to the pedal octaves. The manual part is again a bit on the shrill side at times. This is very live organ-playing.

No information is given as to the organ on which Francis W. Sutton played for the recording of Boëllmann's 'Gothic Suite,' but it is clearly a good instrument for the purpose. Mr. Sutton does well in the first two movements—the registration of the Minuet is particularly good—but he makes the middle stages of the 'Prière' seem quite flippant, and the Toccata sounds hurried and excited (5100-51).

Vocal records are so numerous that a mere mention of the best must suffice. My preferences are for John Coates: 'Take a pair of sparkling eyes' and Purcell's 'Knotting Song' (9506), 'Phillida flouts me' and Thomson's 'The Knight of Bethlehem'—although there is too much tremolo in the latter for my taste (5103); Francis Russell: 'Lend me your aid' (9508); Roy Henderson: Tchaikovsky's 'None but the weary heart' ('rejoice,' adds the label!) and 'Oh no, John!'—perhaps a leetle overdoing the comedy touch in the latter (5061); and Dennis Noble: 'I'm the factotum of the town,' from 'The Barber,' and 'Tempest of the heart,' from 'Trovatore'—the buffo song is specially good (9556).

Finally, at the risk of offending serious readers, I must admit to great enjoyment of 'Ukulele Ike' in a couple of ditties whose droll accompanying noises are irresistible (5068).

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Borodin's Letters.' With a Preface and Notes, by S. A. Dianin. Vol. i.

[State Editions, Moscow, 1928.]

Writers dealing with Russian music of the 19th century have been suffering, so far (most of them quite unconsciously), from lack of information. But this shortage is being remedied, and the time draws near when it will become possible to see the makers of Russian music in their true perspective, and to write their history, not merely their legend.

In this respect great value attaches to Borodin's correspondence, very little of which was known. A collection of a hundred and four letters had been published, long ago, by Stassof; others had appeared in various Russian periodicals—in all, about a third of the amount preserved, and that third heavily censored. Therefore, the study of the published texts led to many misconceptions, not as regards Borodin himself, whose altogether lovable personality was revealed clearly enough by what little we knew of him until now, but so far as concerns his relations with his circle and, more generally, the history of that circle.

This first volume contains a hundred and fifty-six letters, covering the period from August, 1857, to November, 1871. It gives a very full insight into his simple, cheerful, singularly live disposition, his soundness of judgment, his vivid imagination, his genial humour (the humour of a shy and sensitive man), and his most human attitude towards life and art. It will be possible to deal with all these points in full when the following volumes are available. But, meanwhile, I cannot resist the temptation to note the one detail that in the course of his letters to his wife, over fifty different pet-names or nicknames for her occur. One is left speculating as to how many more of these the second and third volumes will reveal.

He never evinced any inclination towards dogmatising or hair-splitting; nor was he particularly fond of talking about himself. But he loved to narrate his experiences, describing them delightfully, and as a rule very circumstantially.

That he had a rare gift for pen-portraits is known by his famous letter to Stassof containing the description of his first meeting with Moussorgsky—a letter quoted in all books on the author of 'Boris Godunov.' There is a good deal more of vivid, accurate information of this kind in the letters now revealed. Specially interesting are the many passages referring to Balakirev, about whom less is known than about any other Russian composer of that period.

There are two legends concerning Balakirev the teacher: one shows him as tireless and almost infallible, ever capable of understanding and eager to encourage; the other shows him as violently prejudiced, narrow-minded, and not particularly competent. It is easy enough to surmise that the truth lies somewhere between these two extremes, but no one, so far, has determined exactly where. In one of Borodin's letters to his wife (a letter obviously not intended for publication) occur a few paragraphs that will go a long way towards showing us Balakirev not as a piece of splendidly efficient or quite worthless machinery, but as a human being who was neither infallible nor always consistent :

> 'With regard to my Symphony [N.B., the second], Balakirev, as usual, started asking me to alter and remodel various parts ; and, as usual, he suggested the very opposite of what he had suggested before. For instance, I had decided that when the second theme reappears for the first time it should be in full, and in G major, but he urged me to repeat it only partly, and in E flat major. Now I played it to him in that form, and he started asking me why I did not repeat the theme in full, and not in the unsuitable E flat major, but, say, in G major ! . . . I found it difficult to get back from him the score of my first Symphony, which I had lent him, and I discovered that if he wished to retain it, it was on account of certain views of his concerning a recast of sundry parts ; the copy turned out to be sprinkled with notes such as : " Give this to the clarinets " or " to the 'cellos," " double," and so forth. And always these notes suggested the very things I had done at first, and then altered in accordance with his advice. It was only by promising to carry out all his new instructions that I was able to get my score back.'

But for all Balakirev's exasperating lack of consistency, Borodin (and with him most of his colleagues) was always eager to court his advice, and often benefited by it.

Another passage of great historic importance occurs in a letter of October, 1871 :

> 'Moussorgsky is offended by the unjust and presumptuous utterances which Balakirev made with regard to " Boris " in the presence of other people. Korsakov is angry on account of his indifference to " The Maid of Pskof." Cui resents his apathy and incuriosity as to what is being done in our musical circle. There was a time when he was the first to show interest in our new things, however slight—even embryonic. But, alas, the chasm between him and us grows wider every day.'

The editor, Mr. S. Dianin (the son of one of Borodin's dearest friends), has done his work admirably, providing an interesting preface and a wealth of most useful notes. The book, unfortunately, is not likely to be translated into English. And this is a great pity, for it would interest many people who are unable to read Russian.

By way of frontispiece, there is a photograph of Borodin at the age of twenty-two (with a cousin of his), which is particularly interesting. It shows a keen-featured, strong-looking, attractive youth, very different from the genial, sedate, elderly man with whom current photographs have made us familiar. M.-D. C.

'The Songs of Schubert.' By C. E. le Massena. With Interpretative Suggestions by Hans Merx.

[Schirmer, $2.50.]

This book deals with about two hundred of the songs, and does it in a capable manner. Discussions are brief, and are preceded by the opening phrase of the melody, the source of the words, date of composition, opus number, and original key. Then follow a synopsis of the text, a short analysis, and hints on performance. Some generally neglected songs are included, e.g., 'Waldesnacht,' 'An die untergehende Sonne,' 'Der blinde Knabe,' 'Das Echo,' 'Fahrt zum Hades,' &c. This is good, but it is a defect that some undoubtedly first-rate songs are omitted, such as 'Die Sterne' (Schlegel), 'Der Wanderer' (Schlegel), 'Am Flusse' (Goethe), 'Auflösung'—one of the finest—and 'Delphine'—another great song. Unfortunately, the author seems to be unaware of the many excellent English translations that have appeared during the past few years in Music and Letters, and in the volume published in 1924 by the Oxford University Press. By the way, he says that the poem of 'Kolmas Klage' is 'probably by Freiherr von Harold, in the Ossianic style, but not a translation of Ossian's "Colma."' But Mr. Richard Capell in his book on the songs points out that the original text is Ossian's, and comes from 'The Songs of Selma.' The American author is wrong. Has he never read the beginning :

> 'Tis night : and on thy hill of storms
> Alone I here remain ;
> The wind is in the mountains heard
> Wild-roaring o'er the plain.'

Schubert did not, of course, set all the stanzas of 'Colma.'

In the Appendix Mr. le Massena gives some useful lists of songs suitable for various voices, with suggested programmes. But among the songs that he regards as suitable for all voices are some that ought not to be there. For example, 'Ave Maria' should not be sung by men, nor should women attempt 'Der Wanderer,' 'An die Dioscuren,' and 'Drang in die Ferne' ; and she must indeed be emancipated who would essay 'Gebet während der Schlacht'—a soldier's song—and 'Wallensteiner Langknecht'—an extremely racy drinking ditty. The book is conveniently arranged, and does efficiently what it sets out to do, though a trifle drily. H. G.

'Appreciation of Music.' By Frank Howes.

[Longmans : 2*s.* cloth ; 1*s.* paper.]

'The Concert-Goer's Library of Descriptive Notes.' By Rosa Newmarch.

[Oxford University Press, 3*s.* 6*d.*]

So much windy nonsense has been written under the label of 'musical appreciation' that the very term has become suspect. Mr. Howes's little book is refreshingly sane and practical on the musical side, and (a hardly less important merit) excellent from the literary point of view. His clear thinking and skilful writing enable him to include an astonishing amount of matter in ten chapters on Listening, Tone, Tune, Harmony, Form, Rhythm, Choral Music, The Orchestra, Opera, and On Being Musical. In the last, Mr. Howes does well to emphasise the fact that the only way to appreciate music is to get into direct touch with it. 'No one ever became musical by reading a book on musical appreciation. . . . Study does increase enjoyment, and does deepen understanding. . . . But it should never be forgotten that music is an experience. It is something that happens to one, like an unexpected gift or bad news, like a summer holiday or an illness, like falling in love. . . .' But it is anything but a passive affair. 'On the contrary, the great argument for Musical Appreciation is that the more you bring to music the more you find in it, and the more you get out of it.' Such a concise and sensible book as this is one of the best of helps.

Mrs. Newmarch's book is of service in a different way, dealing with works instead of principles. The Notes are mainly selected from the vast number written by her for the programme-books of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. Such wine needs no bush. All that needs to be said is that the works dealt with in this book—the first of a series—are those with which the average listener is in frequent touch at concerts and viâ gramophone and radio. The size of the volume suits it for the pocket, so it may be enjoyed in tube or bus before or after a concert performance of any of its subjects—the most profitable time for the reading of descriptive notes, as the author points out. While the music is on tap, we should be all ears and no eyes.

'A Musical Pilgrimage in Yorkshire.' By J. Sutcliffe Smith.

[Leeds: Richard Jackson.]

Local musical history is a field too little explored. Every county—even microscopic Rutland—should have its musical annals written. Such books have a double value and interest. They place on record much that would otherwise be lost; and their worth is likely to increase with time, because they are necessarily concerned with minutiæ that may be of great service to future historians. As Dr. Herbert Thompson points out in his Foreword, we go to a Pepys or a Farington for details which, despite their triviality, shed valuable light on a period. Perhaps we should say 'because of' rather than 'despite'; if we want to see which way the wind blows, a single straw serves better than the whole rick. Dr. Sutcliffe Smith is enthusiastic and comprehensive, and gives us a wealth of portraits and other illustrations. Even when the vast acreage and the large centres of population are taken into account, it is clear that Yorkshire's share in the musical life of the country is handsome. Her claims to distinction depend less on her choral achievements than is generally known. Only when the names of her notable performers, conductors, and composers are thus massed does one realise the size of her contribution to English music, past and present. A more compact literary method and a smaller size would have improved the book; its bulk and weight seem to suggest that the author wished his work to reflect something of the amplitude of the shire and the burliness of its folk.

'Letters of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.' Selected and Edited by Hans Mersmann. Translated from the German by M. M. Bozman.

[Dent, 10*s.* 6*d.*]

Mozart was one of the best of letter-writers. The spontaneity of his music is always present, and there is an entire absence of the studied effect which makes us regard so much published correspondence—especially that of literary folk—with a touch of suspicion. We feel that the writers had only one eye on the recipients of their letters; the other was on the public. Hence the frequent unreliability of letters from a biographical point of view. Mozart's are the real thing, and they make first-rate reading, partly because they are a genuine revelation of his personality, and even more because of the nimble mind and fancy behind them. The letters in this volume cover his life from childhood, the first being written when he was but thirteen years old. They are helped out as a narrative by the interspersion of letters from his father. Mr. Bozman's translation reads with the life and ease of an original. Numerous portraits and other illustrations add to the interest of a very attractive volume.

'Franz Schubert: A Sequence of Sonnets and a Prose Anthology.' By Eva Mary Grew.

[British Musician Office, Birmingham, 5*s.*]

This is a pretty little volume of the keepsake order, with neatly-turned verse and well-produced portrait and other illustrations. The prose extracts are from a wide circle of authors and critics, British and foreign, and include quotations from Schubert's letters, &c. Binding, print, and arrangement are all tasteful.

'On Conducting School Orchestras.' By Adam Carse.

[Augener, 1*s.*]

This is a reprint of some articles that appeared in the Monthly Musical Record. Thoroughly practical, the pamphlet should be of service to many amateur conductors, as well as to those for whom it was designed.

A second edition of Cecil Gray's 'Survey of Contemporary Music' has just appeared. On its publication four years ago this book provoked a good deal of warm discussion. How do Mr. Gray's somewhat startling estimates stand after the interval? He seems likely to prove right in regard to Stravinsky; his claims on behalf of van Dieren have not been strengthened by the publication and performance of a good deal of the composer's output; time will, we think, show that he is incapable of realising the greatness of Elgar; he was ahead of most critics in his appreciation of the real Sibelius—not the Sibelius of the 'Valse Triste'; and so forth. Thanks to its stimulating character and literary distinction, the book bears a second perusal remarkably well (Oxford University Press, 7*s.* 6*d.*).

J. Walker McSpadden's 'Opera Synopses' appears in an enlarged edition. It now contains eighty-six synopses, twenty-three of which are fresh. The additions have to do mainly with works by living composers — Strauss, Holst, Vaughan Williams, Smyth, Deems Taylor, Bryson, and Krenek (Harrap, 5*s.*).

Sterling Mackinlay's 'Origin and Development of Light Opera,' recently reviewed in these columns, has just been issued in a cheap edition (Hutchinson, 10*s.* 6*d.*).

SONGS

A large number of this month's issues are reprints. Some ten songs are added to Dr. Whittaker's fine edition of arias from the Handel operas (Oxford University Press), and five to J. Michael Diack's set of songs from the same composer's oratorios and operas, published by Paterson. Both collections include some good things. Joseph Williams sends reprints of two excellent old English works, Arne's beautiful 'Sleep, gentle cherub,' and Bishop's 'Echo Song,' with flute obbligato, which ought not to drop into oblivion, and will be welcome in this edition of Dawson Freer's.

From Paterson also comes a setting by J. Michael Diack of George Macdonald's 'That holy thing,' which is simple and plain-spoken, but does not by any means rise to the intensity of the fine poem. There are one or two curious and rather awkward accentuations, as on 'for' in the first sentence, which impede the flow of the words and detract from the effect of the music.

Winthrop Rogers send another song by Elizabeth Poston, four of whose works were noticed last month. It is a setting of some attractive words from the Harleian MSS., 'In praise of woman.' This composer is almost as interesting in her selection of words as Peter Warlock, to whose art, perhaps, she owes something in her handling as well as her choice of poetry. This is a good song, with a most effective finish; perhaps, however, a little over-full in the accompaniment in one or two places.

A very intimate and charming little work is 'My Father's Close,' by Clifton Parker (Curwen). The composer has contrived to keep in his music all the freshness of Rossetti's translation; and his dropping of the accompaniment figure at the end of the song is a very happy touch. It matches finely the deepening tone of the poem, and lets the poet's climax have full effect. It is a beautiful little song.

There is sensitiveness again and a touch of distinction in Creighton Allen's 'To the river' (Schirmer); the flowing accompaniment and the unaffected treatment of the words are very telling, and the song has atmosphere. More ordinary in style and conventional in outlook is Maude Craske Day's 'Fisher Lad' (Cramer).

Three 'Irish Country Songs'—'I know my love,' 'I know where I'm goin',' and 'A Ballymure Ballad'—have been well arranged by Rebecca Clarke for voice and violin, and are issued by the Oxford University Press. Singers of these songs will be glad to have them in a new and very effective setting. 'Ten Welsh Folk-Songs,' arranged by D. Vaughan Thomas, are published by Curwen. All of these will be new to most English musicians; they are somewhat unequal, but the best of them, as, for example, 'Farewell to thee, my homeland,' and 'My dear one,' are beautiful tunes.

PIANOFORTE

It is interesting to note the results of Herbert Howells's contact with Elizabethan music and old instruments; one sees them in 'Lambert's Clavichord' and again in 'A Little Book of Dances,' just published by the Oxford University Press. A turn of the first phrase of 'Minuet' is a case in point, and there are others in 'Pavane' and 'Galliard.' But it is far from being unnatural or affected, for just as with the occasional reminders of Ravel, Howells seems to have made these gestures part of himself, and they fall perfectly into place in his work. The neatness and freshness of his mind and hand are particularly suited to these small forms into which so much fragrance and tenderness can be infused, and some of the dances in the present volume are full of gentle charm. For all their looking to the past they are thoroughly modern in spirit, and very sophisticated, often very regretful, as in 'Pavane,' and sometimes both sad and humorous (those moods so often go together), as in 'Minuet.' Altogether a charming and highly personal little book, which one is very glad to keep close at hand, for playing at the end of a day's work; and that is a great compliment to pay to any music.

Another Oxford University Press issue is Holst's 'Two Folk-Song Fragments,' based on North-Country ballads of Dr. Whittaker's. Holst sets them with real freshness; he first lays out the tunes simply, then surrounds them with arabesques of sound which form a fitting accompaniment to melodies which are in both cases self-sufficing. It is his realisation of this fact that makes Holst's treatment so good; like Bartók (with whose early settings this first piece is very easily comparable), he does not speak for the tune in his own language—he gives it its own natural setting and lets it speak for itself. The thing is beautifully done. The end of the second number in particular is fascinating. Here, by the way, verse 2 looks alarming with a signatures of two flats in one hand and of two naturals in the other. But it is only Holst's logical manner of writing out a quite ordinary passage in the simplest way, and there is nothing 'modern' about it.

Four pieces by Katharine Parker come from Winthrop Rogers; all are very sensitive and poetical in feeling. The composer is not critical, however; she does not deny herself the luscious effects that are so easily obtained and so soon worn out; and this lack of austerity is a fault both of manner and matter. 'One Summer Day' is, perhaps, the most free from over-facility, and therefore the most satisfying. It shows, as also does 'Down Longford way,' that the composer can write a tune; and 'The Red Admiral' and 'A Patchwork of Shadows' show a command of pianoforte style. What more is wanted? Probably only a less ready acceptance of the obvious. This is precisely what is felt, too, about Alec Rowley's 'In Spring-time—and in May' and 'The Piper.' The latter is the best, because it cuts itself so very short, as if conscious of its slender burden of meaning. It is a very attractive trifle; the other piece goes on too long, and outlasts the interest of its little devices—its fourths and fifths, and so on. Swinstead's 'Thanksgiving' is more straightforward, its tunes are not so much 'spiced-up,' so that one is not so easily made impatient if it is apt to repeat itself. It gives itself no airs, and so is welcome. Also from Augener is R. M. Richardson's Sonata in A. Certain obvious weaknesses will strike every player—the lumpy pianoforte writing, the artless way in which the work divides itself into text-book sections. There is much more to notice than this, however. The composer writes a very graceful, lyrical, frank style of melody; he has a sense of climax (vide movement No. 2); he is quite content to write what he thinks, and let it take its chance. There is no attempt to make it sound other or deeper than it is. The result is a work that can be played with pleasure, and whose failures do not irritate the hearer half so much as the thinly-concealed futilities of the more self-conscious sort of music.

Two further issues of the Oxford University Press are J. Barham Johnson's 'Hard-handed men' and York Bowen's 'Berceuse' (this last in the 'Clarendon' series). The hard-handed men are, of course, 'Snug—a joiner,' 'Quince—a carpenter,' and so on, and a very pleasant, thoughtful, plain-spoken set of fellows the composer makes them. More than one is a little sad, and Snug is a bit awkward at times, perhaps; but Bottom's aplomb redeems all. A good idea, and the composer shows a real sense of humour and character, as well as musical restraint and skill. York Bowen relies largely on the shades of colour that a good pianist can obtain; his music is not modern in thought or austere in texture; often it is almost commonplace, but is saved by the beauty of sound that it can achieve. There is much in 'Berceuse' that is sensitive, and all is effective.

Maurice Besly is of the same mind. His 'Eidullion,' skilfully laid out for left-hand alone, seems almost carried away by the beauty of comparatively ordinary sounds, not expressing anything very much; and there is undoubted beauty here, but one must be in the right frame of mind if it is not to seem rather an over-facile kind. Winthrop Rogers, who publish it, also send Julius Harrison's sincere and picturesque sketches, 'Severn Country'—thoughtful music written with directness and a sense of effect.

From Edward Organ comes Joaquin Turina's 'Ritmos,' a dance-fantasy for pianoforte, dated 1928. After an invocatory Prelude there follows a set of dances, including a 'tragic valse,' a 'Garrotin,' and a final exotic dance which includes references to former sections and winds up the work. All is written effectively and with a skilfully maintained interest, but I doubt if there is much 'to it.' Turina is preferable in his genuinely high-spirited 'Jeux,' from the Suite 'Ninerias' (Durand). He is writing for his children, and using such tunes as 'We won't go home till morning,' or whatever that is in Spain. The thing is full of rhythm and life, and its spontaneity makes it most attractive; one would like to see the other seven numbers of the Suite.

Also from Durand are 'Quatre Préludes—d'une aube retrouvée,' by Febvre-Longeray. There is much here that is thoughtful and telling, and the composer, writing in a modern idiom, keeps his designs firm and clear, even if the texture is sometimes thick. Prelude No. 3 has some beautiful stuff in it, but the last, based on the tune of a well-known Schubert March, seems rather pointless.

VIOLIN

The Oxford University Press has just issued a 'Slumber Song' (from the aria 'Schlummert ein,' Cantata No. 82), by Bach, and in another volume the same composer's Adagio (Sonatina from Cantata 106, 'God's time is best') and Presto (from the 'Hunting Cantata'). These have been arranged for violin and pianoforte by Harvey Grace, and it is hardly necessary to add that there is nothing in these arrangements (apart from the change of medium) which does not conform strictly to the spirit and the letter of Bach. Not less notable in an age so deeply attached to notes and explanations is the editor's reticence. He gives us all that matters, all the essential directions as regards colour and expression, but nothing more. Yet he knows all our weaknesses, and the non rall. at the end of the Presto will save many a player from a blunder. We have reason to be grateful for these arrangements. They are exquisitely beautiful, and must accordingly appeal to public performers. At the same time their value for students is incalculable. Of all the great composers Bach is the one who can best be trusted to correct errors of taste, lay the foundations of a personal style which will not be merely singular but authoritative, and teach scholarly habits. Moreover, the art of expression can nowhere be studied with greater advantage than in this music at once expressive and dignified.

An Impromptu Serenade by A. Mantovani ('Strad' Edition) has the merits of a facile melody and effective writing for the instrument—the qualities of the 'encore' piece which is offered to an audience that has no longer the right to demand distinction.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Dr. Ernest Walker's Sonata in F minor (Oxford University Press) for 'cello and pianoforte is the kind of music one reads and reads again with great pleasure. One inevitably follows the workings of a mind singularly agile and well stocked with interest, but Dr. Walker's music is far from being a mere intellectual exercise, and the instinct, the 'inspiration,' is not less evident than the cleverness with which it is controlled and directed in the proper channel. The combination is unusual, and the upshot a rare distinction of style. This is more than can be said of Bernard Wagenaar's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (G. Schirmer)—in other ways an elaborate and praiseworthy piece of work. Just before (1) a curious carelessness on the part of the printer (presumably) has placed the expression marks (< ff > ppp) not under the notes but under the rest signs. Although the error may have crept in unknown to the composer, it seems somehow symbolical. The final impression one derives from his music is one of constant and exaggerated emphasis. The gentleman protests too much. There is more measure and greater care in Harold Vincent Jervis-Read's Sextet (Murdoch), a short composition in two movements which should attract the players as much as the listeners, and maintains well the interest the first thirty bars arouse.

Oddly enough, not less than three composers have been attracted by miniature trios in the last month or so. Alec Rowley's 'Pastel Portraits' for pianoforte trio (Goodwin & Tabb) is a Suite of four numbers entitled 'My Lady Frivol,' 'Colin Clout,' 'Belle Marquise,' and 'Tom Tug.' The titles provide the clue to their identity. Well written, easy to play (the violin part lies comfortably within four positions), very pleasing to the ear, the Suite should be a boon to competitive festival committees. Not so light is the hand of Alfred Hill, whose Miniature Trio in C major (G. Schirmer) is anything but like a miniature in style. The composer has so written the string parts that they can be played also by flute, oboe, or clarinet (in lieu of the violin), and bassoon instead of 'cello. These instruments having a limited repertory may be more interested in this music than string players. The 'Three Little Trios' by F. Percival Driver (International Music Co.) are little pieces for beginners, unpretentious yet ingenious in their way. F. B.

UNISON

How difficult it is to find music meet for Ben Jonson's exquisite 'Hymn to Diana'! The most impressive setting I know is Ernest Walker's, for four-part children's choir. R. H. Hull sets the poem broadly, with a good spread of sail, if not with perfect elevation of style (Oxford University Press).

A lively six-eight Irish tune is arranged by G. R. Olden, to words from 'Irish National Poetry.' The words are passably good, and the tune trips charmingly. This is a good test for clear enunciation and tip-toe lightness. The title is 'Fairy Revels.' Boughton makes of Drinkwater's 'If all the carts were painted gay' a clear, happy song, which he calls 'Holiness.' How the gaiety the poem describes is to 'make a spiritual land' I don't quite see; but the sparkling tune is well worth singing (Curwen).

Edgar Moy's 'Snow' is plain and easy—about playing truant. If the moral doesn't matter, the tune can be enjoyed. Of three songs with words and music by E. Shenton, 'The Scarecrow's Song' is fairly brisk, in six-eight time, with dotted quavers. It has a good curving line. "Mr. Owl' must be sung with light accents, so as to avoid the squareness of too evenly stressing its rows of quavers. 'Adventures' may be sung with actions. It suits quite small children. Some commas are missing from this song. Mr. Shenton's words are rather tame (Rogers).

'Fox-cubs, beware!' is a junior song, the tune coming from Germany. It points a moral—or a half-moral—'If you can't have goose for supper, be content with mice.' A pretty ditty. 'The Answer' and 'A Christmas Song' are by G. Rathbone. The first is suitable for Christmas, as well as the second. These are happy, quiet songs, moving smoothly and gracefully. With 'The Answer' is printed 'What child is this?'—a carol with a descant. The tune is that we know as 'Greensleeves'; it makes a capital little piece, fresh and sparkling. F. W. Wadely's 'The Jackdaw' has words by Cowper, from the Latin. This gives plenty of opportunity for expressive pointing of the narrative, and suits older children. 'I vow to thee, my country,' by Geoffrey Shaw, is for massed singing. It has a second verse that makes it suitable for use in church or Sunday School as an anthem. This is a little less distinguished than some of the composer's songs, but it will go well when sung with lusty patriotism and piety. 'Progressive Sight-Tests' provides a complete course through unison, two- and three-part singing. The first book, No. 332 of Novello's 'School Songs,' is in Staff notation, and Book 333 gives the same music in Sol-fa. Each book (6*d.*) is in seven grades, with about half a dozen tests in each grade. Here is just what most singing classes need—plenty of material suitable for any fairly early stage of progress, bound up cheaply (Novello). W. R. A.

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

The more advanced sight-singing books, in two and three parts, are Nos. 334 (Staff) and 335 (Sol-fa). The difficulty of the last tests in the book is not extreme. This collection is, perhaps, even more useful than that of unison tests, since it is almost always difficult to get hold of much music to read that is not too complex. The price, as before, is 6*d.* for each book. Horn's favourite, 'I've been roaming,' is now arranged as a two-part song, the lower part only going down to C. H. A. Chambers has added to 'The Bonnie Banks o' Loch Lomond' a descant, straightforward and easy (Novello).

Felix White sets words by Langhorne, of the 18th century ('The Red-breast') with a sense of the warmth and piquancy of the little scene depicted. This is for S.S. For S.M.-S. is his music to C. Rossetti's 'I know a baby.' This flows quietly, in nine-eight, and the movement is cleverly varied and sustained. Both these songs are successes (Oxford University Press).

'When daisies pied' set yet again—and with the original sixth and last lines! Margaret Crichton does it fairly effectively, but she might have avoided the first beat stress on 'with.' There is a little square-cutness elsewhere, which, at the quick pace, need not necessarily distress the ear if the singers (S.C.) are clever. R. A. Thompson's 'Cradle Song' (S.C.) has a little chromatic movement, and breathes just a breath of fresh air. It is a hard task to say anything new when Blake is your partner in a cradle song. This is a setting of his 'Sleep, sleep, beauty bright' (Curwen). W. R. A.

MALE-VOICE

Bantock's latest for T.T.B.B. is 'Hope the Horn-blower' (Newbolt's words). Choirs will know what to expect, from the title, and will not be disappointed, either in the style or the spirit (Curwen).

S. E. Lovatt has arranged 'Richard of Taunton Dene' for men's voices (T.T.BAR.B.) at some length. The bass has a good deal of the tune, so the ship must have a strong keel. The piece follows the usual lines. More contrapuntal interest, and greater variation in the accompaniments, would have warmed up the musical interest. It is easy enough, and provides a good deal of useful practice (Williams). W. R. A.

MIXED-VOICE

C. Lee Williams knows his choral writing, and is always clear and likeable. His setting of part of Gray's 'Elegy' ('The curfew tolls') for S.A.T.B. tells its homely tale with quiet dignity. I wish he had not broken, and made a pause, in the last line at 'lead but to.' Choirs of sober tastes will enjoy this piece (Novello).

Alan Bush, who won a Carnegie award with a quartet written at twenty-two, has set Shelley's 'To the men of England,' and set it with some distinction and power. The piece (for S.A.T.B.) is dedicated to the London Labour Choral Union. I am glad that any political party should have music made for it that has some clear ideas. (I believe the Labour people have the best art tunes so far.) But what a pity to choose this yeasty stuff of Shelley's, full of bombast and bogeyism! You may remember that he urges the 'Bees of England' (the busy ones, whose blood the rich drones would fain drink) to 'forge many a weapon.' Was ever such a piece of fustian from a real poet! This is worse than Alfred Austin at his foamiest. Mr. Bush will do Labour, and his art, better service by scrapping this fat boy's fable, and setting his fancy to work at real poetry. He has good matter in him (Curwen). W. R. A.

How different is the spirit of 'Humanity,' set by Norman Demuth for two choirs, each S.A.T.B. Here is philosophical dignity of style. The mood is well caught. The melody does not always move in the freest sweeps, but there is a strong pulse in the work. It presents no high difficulties, and is quite short (Oxford University Press).

The concert edition of 'Tales of Hoffmann' is arranged by M. Jacobson for Cramers (5*s*.). It is remarked in a note that the continuity of the plot is maintained, but that cuts can readily be made. The whole work takes about an hour and a half in this form. The orchestral parts can be hired. The soloists required are three—soprano, tenor, and baritone. The music is sufficiently attractive to stand without the stage trappings, and this version should be welcomed by societies that like to do operas in concert form. W. R. A.

CHURCH MUSIC

An edition—with English version by Lucia Young—of Brahms's fine Motet, Op. 74, No. 2, 'O rend the heavens,' comes from Novello. It is for S.A.T.B. unaccompanied, and needs a first-class choir. A sturdy tune of sixteen bars (3-2 time) appears in the treble for verses 1 and 2, with free contrapuntal treatment of the lower voices—in the second verse by diminution. In the next verse the tenors sing a free version of the tune and the counterpoint is varied rhythmically. Verse 4 is an expressive Adagio (4-2), with the tune in the bass against smoothly-flowing crotchets mainly grouped in pairs. The last verse is in 2-2 time (Allegro), with the tune, freely treated, at the top, the work closing brilliantly with a florid contrapuntal setting of 'Amen.'

The same publishers send also some other new issues which are worth noting by choirmasters. Those with good choirs should certainly examine Edgar L. Bainton's anthem, 'And I saw a new Heaven.' It is for four voices and organ, and though not really difficult, needs sensitive treatment. It is in 3-2 time (Andante moderato), and much of the smooth vocal writing is in gently-flowing crotchet movement, often over a sustained organ bass. The opening section in D minor—ranging tonally from pp to a brief f—leads into a short full section, and then follows a beautifully expressive treatment—in the tonic major—of 'And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes,' shading off finally into a tranquil pianissimo.

Another admirably written work is F. W. Wadely's setting as a full anthem—for a civic service or for general use—of 'O God of Wisdom,' words by James Walter Brown. The first verse is sung by sopranos, the tenors and basses follow with a free version of the tune, which is then further developed by the full choir. The writing is fluent and interesting, and its difficulties only moderate. An average, well-balanced choir could make an effective thing of Eric H. Thiman's unaccompanied anthem for Evensong, 'O Father, Who didst all things make.' An excellent tune undergoes varied treatment, appearing, for example, once in the tenor, with imitative entries by the other voices. The last verse works up to a broad, imposing climax. The same composer's hymn for Armistice Day, 'Come, Lord, and rule the earth,' has a bold, simple melody, with an optional descant for the last verse.

Novello's 'Descant Carol Book' contains eight popular carols: 'A Virgin unspotted,' 'Good Christian men, rejoice,' 'Good King Wenceslas,' 'I saw three ships,' 'Shepherds, shake off your drowsy sleep,' 'The First Nowell,' 'What Child is this'? and 'While shepherds watched.' In addition to the admirable descants there is an interesting and helpful Preface, which should be read by all who are in any doubt as to the proper use of this device. The remaining issues from this house are H. Scott-Baker's setting in B flat of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, and 'A Cradle Hymn,' by C. Lee Williams. The last is a melodious, tender little setting for single voice of words by S. T. Coleridge. The text is in Latin and English. Mr. Scott-Baker's setting is for S.A.T.B., with accompaniment ad lib. The tenor part, by the way, is nowhere beyond the range of a baritone. The writing is bold and dignified in style and perfectly straightforward. Though quite easy to sing, there are special opportunities for big choirs in some fortissimo phrases where the parts divide.

Many will have already heard Dr. Vaughan Williams's impressive setting of the Te Deum, written for the service of enthronement of Dr. Cosmo Gordon Lang as Archbishop of Canterbury, at Canterbury Cathedral. The writing is flowing and dignified, and by no means difficult. The choir is frequently divided with fine effect, e.g., in the big sweeping phrases sung to 'praise Thee' and in the responsive 'Holies.' Considerable use is made of a chiming four-note figure, first heard as a bass in the organ part. Its final appearance—as melody in both voice and organ parts and then as a ground bass in the climax reached on p. 9—is particularly effective. The setting arranges for the optional use of the 'Shortened Form' of the Te Deum, a full close occurring at 'in glory everlasting.' It is published by the Oxford University Press. From the same house may be obtained 'The People's Nicene Creed'—two traditional unison melodies for congregational use, together with Paternoster and other common chants, set with an accompaniment by J. H. Arnold. The organ part is excellent, and there is also a useful and informative Introduction.

Two well-written and tuneful carols—'The Holy Child' and 'O Royal Babe'—and a musicianly setting of 'Ave Verum' (Latin and English text) for S.A.T.B. unaccompanied, are by Chastey Hector (Faith Press). The same publishers issue H. F. V. Somerset's Anthem for Christmas or Epiphany, 'The King of Heaven is born to-day' and an Easter Carol, or Anthem, 'Now the winds are all composure.' Bernard Naylor's carol anthem, 'A Childing slept,' is a work of outstanding merit which should not be overlooked by choirmasters. It is for soprano and baritone soli, S.A.T.B. chorus, and organ, and is published by Curwens. Two other works from this house are a simple and apt setting of Herrick's Ode (Nativity), by Armstrong Gibbs, and Maurice Jacobson's 'Peace, peace,' for chorus of mixed voices (unaccompanied). The latter is decidedly modern in treatment, and needs very delicate singing. It would be interesting to hear an adequate performance; played on the pianoforte much of it sounds harsh and uncouth.

E. T. Sweeting's 'I vow to thee, my country,' for T.T.BAR.B. unaccompanied, is an attractive, straightforward setting of Cecil Spring Rice's words, which gives opportunities for expressive singing. The music is in both notations (Stainer & Bell). H. B. Collins has edited William Byrd's Motet, 'O Magnum Mysterium,' for Christmas and the Circumcision. It is for S.A.T.B. and the text is in Latin. The writing is contrapuntal throughout (molto sostenuto), and a good choir is necessary (Chester).

ORGAN MUSIC

Of the considerable amount of organ music awaiting review it has to be admitted that the most important is a new edition of a classic—the Eleven Chorale Preludes of Brahms. These fine works are now firmly established in the repertory, but they have got there under difficulties. The original edition was barely practicable in some of its details; the phrasing was intermittent, and almost certainly did not always represent the intentions of the composer. (Like Mendelssohn in his organ music, Brahms seems often to have hastily written slurs suggestive of bowing marks rather than of keyboard phrasing.) The lay-out was sometimes inconvenient, the frequent use of the alto clef was a bugbear to many, and there were several points where the change of manuals was ambiguously shown. A further hindrance to the English organist was the absence of the text of the hymn treated. All these defects have been made good in an admirable edition by John E. West, just published by Novello in two books. (I.—IV.; V.—XI.). There is no more practical editor of organ music than Mr. West, who brings to the task long experience as an organ player and composer, and also ripe musicianship and good taste. He has clearly shown the division of parts between the hands, by re-staving when convenient; the original indications Man. I., Man. II., &c., have been changed into suggested terms of Gt., Sw., &c., the choice of stops being as a rule wisely left to the player. In a few instances the manual changes have been altered for the better. Players will recall several passages in No. 7, 'O Gott, der frommer Gott,' where the original arrangement was so unsatisfactory as to suggest that Brahms had had no opportunity of testing his manual changes on an organ—a likely supposition, as the Preludes were written during the last months of his life, and were published posthumously. Here is a tiny detail in support of this theory: The second setting of 'Herzlich thut mich verlangen,' in which the melody is given to the pedal with 8-ft. tone, ends with a fifth in the pedal part, the tonic being added below the dominant (the melody note). But as the tonic is also present in the L.H., the pedal A is unnecessary and not good in effect. It is just the sort of addition that a non-organ-playing composer would have made, but would hardly have retained after hearing it. Mr. West rightly leaves it, but suggests that it should not be played. Similarly, he has retained all the original time indications and marks of expression, adding undoubted improvements in brackets. In the Preface he suggests that Swell pedal nuances may be used in the more expressive passages, but he has preferred to leave them to the discretion of the player. This is commendable reticence in an editor, and it is to be hoped that Swell-pedal addicts will take the hint and realise that the expressive beauty of these pieces depends very little on nuance. Excellent translations (mainly by Mr. Calvocoressi) of the opening verse of the various hymns have been printed in connection with the melodies. These Preludes are among the choicest things Brahms ever wrote—so entirely full of the spirit of both the Chorales and the instrument as to make players regret keenly the composer's belated attraction to the organ. This excellent edition will surely make them far more widely known than they have been hitherto.

From Novello's comes also a set of 'Five Short and Easy Pieces founded on Hymn-Tunes,' by C. Hylton Stewart. The tunes treated are 'Caithness,' 'Babylon's Streams,' 'Croft's 136th,' 'St. Peter,' and 'Aberystwyth.' As the title indicates, the pieces are suitable for use as voluntaries by players of moderate technique, but their quality and effect are such as to make them well worth the attention of organists generally.

A composer who uses such a title as 'Pièce Idéale' set himself a hard task, but, after all, ideals vary, and players with a taste for somewhat obvious material, with rather more than a touch of sugar in the harmony, will find H. B. Weatherdon's piece attractive. It has a good climax, and is not hard to play. Perhaps a quiet ending would have been an improvement (Novello).

Arthur Somervell's Suite—Air, Sarabande, and Bourrée—originally written for violin solo, has been well arranged by Purcell J. Mansfield. The Scherzetto of J. Frederic Staton leaves this reviewer doubtful. It is rather short-breathed, and some of its dissonances, e.g., at the end of p. 6, are so unconvincing as to suggest engraver's errors. But the vigour—even brusqueness—has an attraction of its own. These two works come from Weekes.

Alec Rowley's happy knack of writing good light music is well exemplified in his 'Elves.' Lightly touched off by a deft finger, it makes a capital recital piece of the dainty type. When Parry wrote Preludes on 'Eventide' and 'St. Cross' there were sniffings among the elect. But the best tunes of Dykes and Monk are far more worthy of organ treatment than the worst of the older types of tune. Here is Frederic H. Wood courageously writing a Fantasia on Dykes's 'Dominus regit me,' the result being an attractive work that would have been better without the three pulls-up on the dominant in the opening section, and the fanfares on the last page. The piece is grateful to play. Two Preludes (under one cover) by C. H. Kitson, are on 'Merton' and 'St. Columba'—the first flowing in 12-8, and working up to a loud ending, the second giving the tune to the tenor with expressive results. They would serve excellently as studies and voluntaries (Stainer & Bell).

From Schirmers (Winthrop Rogers) come three pieces by J. Sebastian Matthews—Fantasia on an Old English Air ('Barbara Allen'), Spring Caprice, and a Slavic Romance, 'The Flower Seller'; and an Introduction and Fugue by Sidney Homer. The Variations halt badly at times, and some of the harmonization is far-fetched. The Caprice is tuneful and unoriginal; the Romance has some pleasing touches and hangs together better, but all three pieces have blemishes in the shape of poor workmanship. Mr. Homer's Fugue is conscientious.

Mozart's marvellous Fugue in C minor, originally for string quartet, has been transcribed by Marcel Dupré. It is forbiddingly difficult. Surely some of the numerous shakes in the inner parts and pedal might have been discarded. They are easy and effective for strings, but the reverse on the organ. The arranger might well have stuck less exactly to the original in some other respects, with all-round advantage. The scientific nature of the work is shown by analytical notes. Everybody will admire this fugue, but not many will be able to play it. As composer, M. Dupré is represented by a 'Lamento'; it contains some poignant moments, but is over-dissonant.

Marcel Bérault's 'Choral Varié' is a good example of austere polyphonic writing. Its key—E flat minor—is hardly relieved for a moment, and the registration is of the barest. The piece is a good study, and inspires respect.

Fernand Mawet's 'Thème et Variations' is of the passacaglia type, with some rather old-fashioned figuration, especially in the pedal part. The Finale is by far the best portion, but there is little originality anywhere. These four last-named pieces are published by Leduc.

A biggish batch comes from the Oxford University Press, mostly in the chorale prelude line. Robin Milford's piece on 'Hanover' misses the essential quality of the tune, and the writing is laboured. In 'St. Columba' the tune is played on a 4-ft. pedal stop, but the composer is not always happy in his harmonization, and there are the usual crudities and strings of fifths in which some of our young composers seem to take a delight. They are not really daring, and are less good in effect than decent part-writing—for which one suspects they are merely a trouble-saving substitute.

Four Sacred Songs by Bach are said on the title-page to be 'edited and arranged' by Bernard Jackson. The tunes are from the Schemelli collection, and Bach may have written these Preludes on them; anyway, the present writer, in a fairly extensive study of Bach, has never met with them. Presumably, therefore, Mr. Jackson has himself made the tunes the bases of these four pieces. If this be so the fact should be stated; the operation has been composition, not editing or arranging. The pieces are well written in the Bachian style—in fact, the idiom of the old man has been somewhat too slavishly followed. The effect, however, is good save for an occasional progression where the harshness seems to be due to a lack of finish on Mr. Jackson's part.

The Chorale Preludes by T. Tertius Noble are somewhat disappointing on the score of unoriginality. Their chief merit is effectiveness. The tunes used are 'Picardy,' 'St. Ann' (the best of the bunch, and a good rousing piece), 'Rockingham,' 'Melcombe,' 'Walsal' (sic), 'St. Kilda,' 'Dundee,' and 'Stracathro.' The composer's 'Prelude Solennel' shows the same defect and merit. The Oxford University Press sends also Sir Henry Wood's transcription of the Largo in E from Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor. It makes a well-sounding piece. H. G.

FULL SCORES

Vaughan Williams's 'Flos Campi,' for viola solo, chorus, and orchestra, is now issued in full score (21*s.*) and also in an arrangement by Gordon Jacob for voices and pianoforte (5*s.*).

It is good to see some research work being done among our 18th-century English composers. Who to-day thinks of Boyce as an instrumental writer? Yet he cut an unexpectedly good figure in that field, judging from the eight symphonies which have just been transcribed and edited by Constant Lambert. The original scoring was for strings, continuo, and oboes, with occasional use of bassoons, horns, and trumpets. As the effect of pianoforte and strings is very different from that of harpsichord and strings, Mr. Lambert rightly omits the continuo, and gives to the strings the few harmonies that are present only in that part. The wind parts are untouched, save in one instance where an oboe part has been simplified, and they are also cued in so as to make the works available for strings alone. The symphonies are quite short, belonging, in fact, to the Concerto Grosso family rather than to the symphonic. They are delightfully tuneful and vigorous, and should become popular.

All the above-named are from the Oxford University Press.

Curwen's have just issued a new work by Eugène Goossens—a 'Rhythmic Dance,' that, judging from the full score, should prove highly attractive. The orchestra used is very large, with a liberal allowance of percussion (7*s.* 6*d.*).

From Augeners comes the score of Frank Bridge's Quartet No. 3, a Coolidge prize-winner, and played with great success at the recent Sienna Festival (4*s.*).

TWO PIANOFORTES, FOUR HANDS

Norman Demuth's Bolero is sonorous and duly warm, and calls for good players, though actually it is not very difficult (Oxford University Press, 2*s.* 6*d.*). Augener's send four pieces by Orlando A. Mansfield—'Songs of the Seasons.' They are well written, but somewhat commonplace in material (each 2*s.* 6*d.*). Harold Bauer has arranged for two pianofortes Schubert's 'Rondo Brillante,' originally written for four hands on one keyboard. I have not the original at hand, so cannot judge as to how far the work gains. This is published by Schirmer ($1.25).

[Why do publishers send a reviewer only one copy of two-pianoforte works, and so deny him the pleasure and opportunity of that run-through which is fairer to both composer and reviewer? Of those named above, double copies were received only of the Mansfield pieces.]

Three additions have lately been made to the Oxford University Press edition of Bach's Church Cantatas: No. 17, 'Who thanks offers, he praiseth Me' ('Wer dank opfert, der preiset mich'); No. 182, 'King of Heaven, be Thou welcome' ('Himmelskönig, sei willkommen'); and No. 133, 'In Thee do I rejoice' ('Ich freue mich in dir'). Of these the second is particularly fine, with three long choruses, one being a beautiful example of a chorale treated in the Pachelbel style. Dr. Whittaker is editor, and the English version of Nos. 182 and 133 are from his pen, Dr. Sanford Terry being responsible for that of No. 17.

'Polichinelle' is a set of thirty-one old nursery songs of France, translated, arranged, and illustrated by J. R. Monsell. The French text is also given, so the book may be used as a jammy way of taking some translation powder. We like the illustrations very much. The pianoforte part usually consists merely of the tune and a single bass part. Something less meagre might have been supplied without adding much, if at all, to the difficulty. We have tried the collection on youngsters; they like it, and that's the main thing (Oxford University Press, 7*s.* 6*d.*).

Twenty old French songs of the 18th century have been fitted with singable English texts by Georgina Tanner, provided with simple pianoforte accompaniment by J. B. Weckerlin, and issued under the title, 'Bergerettes' (Heugel, Paris, 5 fr.).

'MR. BIRD'S BATTELL'

By KATHARINE EGGAR

William Byrd wrote a piece of battle-music for the virginals, of which the most substantial version appears in the MS. collection known as 'My Ladye Nevells Booke.' Regarded merely as a morceau among the rest, its form stamps it as something peculiar.

The majority of pieces in the various virginal collections which have come down to us are Pavans, Galliards, Almains, Fantasias, and variations on song-tunes. Pavans and Galliards are frequently connected, and sometimes it seems indicated to relate them to a preliminary Preludium or to attach them to a concluding Coranto or Jig; but in no case do we find a work definitely consisting of what we should call a series of movements—with one notable exception. This exception is the afore-named battle-piece.

Lady Nevell's Book has recently, for the first time, been printed (1926, Curwen), and the editor, Miss Hilda Andrews, has added to the pieces there grouped under the heading 'The Battell,' three additional numbers which she found in other contemporary MSS. Assuming these additions to be authentic, of what do we find the composition to consist? We find that we have a work covering twenty-seven pages of print and falling definitely into three 'movements' of a homogeneous 'programme.' These movements are entitled:

1. 'The Earl of Oxfordes Marche before the Battell' (four pages).
2. 'The Battell, in 12 sections' (twenty pages).
3. 'The Galliarde for the Victorie' (three pages).

The twelve sections of 'The Battell' have their own sub-titles, as follows:

The Soldiers' Summons.
The March of Footmen.
The March of Horsemen.
Now followeth the trumpets.
The Trumpets.
The Irish March.
The Bagpipe and the Drone.
The Flute and the Drum.
The March to the Fight (in the course of which occurs a bar in which is written under its six notes, 'tantara tantara,' and after this the music works up to a passage of great energy at which is inscribed 'the battells be joyned').
The Retreat.

The three additional pieces inserted at this point in Miss Andrews's edition are:

The Burying of the Dead (Elizabeth Rogers's Virginal Book).
The Morris } (both from Paris Con-
The Soldiers' Dance } servatoire MS. 18,546).

It is clear, then, that we have in this piece of music something quite out of the ordinary both in length and material. There is no other piece of virginal music of anything like twenty-seven pages' length; there is no other march in any of the surviving collections; no other piece has a definite sectional programme nor a similar construction of sequential movements. It is, in fact, a work whose mere appearance on paper commands a certain amount of attention, a work whose dimensions, at any rate, seem in keeping with the position and reputation of the great musician that William Byrd undoubtedly was. Yet our facetious musicians and antiquaries of the late 19th century were pleased to regard Byrd's 'Battle' as the Elizabethan 'Battle of Prague,' and to make merry over the 'childishness' of the composer.

For a more imaginative judgment we must turn to a foreigner. M. van den Borren, in his book on English virginal music,* does not make the mistake of thinking that the Elizabethans, very grown-up people in all ways, were childish about music; and when he comes to consider the composition of 'The Battell,' to which he refers as 'cette suite, qui occupe une place importante dans l'histoire des batailles en musique,' he has something of real value to say about 'la manière dont Byrd comprenait cette musique de guerre.'

'It is obvious,' he says of Lord Oxford's March, 'that Byrd's intention was to suggest, by means of the inherent resources of the virginal, a fanfare of trumpets in the rhythm of a march. The form chosen is that of a free variation following the unusual scheme of A B A^1 B^1. The use of the variation principle allows of the interpolation of little "figures" in quavers and semiquavers which have nothing to do with trumpet technique and are introduced for purely ornamental reasons. They do not in the least interfere with the general effect, which remains that of a march with fanfares. This effect is got by means of a strict rhythm in the bass, which imitates the beat of the drum on the tonic G or on the dominant D, with now and again passing-notes or notes of shorter value, too few to break up the harmony or the rhythm; and, in addition, by means of rudimentary melodic figures similar to those obtained by using the natural sounds on the trumpet. If one adds to these frequent open fifths, sequences of firm, thick chords, and combinations of little fanfares in answer between the different parts (in B^1), one gets some idea of the peculiar military music of the end of the 16th century for which Shakespeare so often gives directions in his historical plays.'

Here, then, is a fair and reasonable account of a composition which, however poor a show it may make in comparison with a Beethoven Pianoforte Sonata or even one by Scarlatti for harpsichord, was yet written by a really great composer. M. van den Borren has only pointed out what could have been seen by any trained musician, but he has seen these technical realities with sympathy and imagination, and above all in relation to their period. He makes it obvious that Mr. Byrd was not 'childish'; he was being very skilful. He had to solve a problem within definite limitations for a particular purpose. He was, in fact, writing the equivalent of a pianoforte reduction of an orchestral score, and the particular purpose for which he did it was a matter which intimately concerned his two patrons, 'My Ladye Nevell' and 'The Erle of Oxford.'

There is, fortunately, no lack of contemporary information about the Earl of Oxford, and those who want to know his early history can find it in Captain Ward's recent book.* There is less certainty about the personality of Lady Nevell, and as it would take too long to set out the claims of various Ladies Nevell to be the Lady of the Booke I can only ask the reader to assume with me that she was the wife of Sir Henry Nevill of Billingbear, Constable of Windsor. Sir Henry Nevill was a great friend of Sir Henry Sidney, father of Philip Sidney. Their sons were also intimate, from which we may presume that their wives would be friendly and, possibly, have tastes in common. Unfortunately, however, although there is at Penshurst a life-size portrait of Lady Mary Sidney holding a wonderful double-necked lute, there does not seem to be any picture of Lady Nevill sitting at the virginal. Such a picture would be a very pretty confirmation of my theory about the Booke, which is that Sir Henry Nevill, Constable of Windsor, was the most likely of the possible Nevills to have employed a Windsor singing-man as copyist. And if it is only surmise that the erstwhile Constable of Windsor employed John Baldwin in 1591, it is unassailable fact that he had taken some trouble to help another Windsor musician several years previously. This was Richard Farrant, Master of the Children of the Sovereign's Free Chapel of St. George in Windsor Castle, and his request for Sir Henry's help is an important link in our story.

On August 27, 1576, Sir Henry Nevill wrote to Sir William More, of Moseley, to beg him to give favourable consideration to the application of Richard Farrant for the lease of some chambers in Blackfriars Priory, which he, Sir Henry, had formerly leased from Sir William, and which Lord Cobham was then about to give up.

Now Farrant was only a humble agent in a great scheme which was maturing in the minds of some very exalted personages, but the immediate purpose for which he wanted rooms near the Thames in London was to establish a music-school for the Children of Her Majesty's Chapel, where, during the winter when the Court was at Westminster, the boys could receive both a musical and a general (grammar-school) education, and at the same time be trained in the preparation of plays for Court entertainments. Emphasis having been laid on the educational nature of the scheme, Sir William More in all innocence accepted his old acquaintance's petitioner and allowed Farrant a lease of the chambers. Here, in collaboration with the Master of the Chapel Royal, William Hunnis, Farrant proceeded to carry out his plan for educating and rehearsing the boys of Windsor Chapel and of the Chapel Royal.

The two Masters were able to present their combined forces with success on Twelfth Night of the following Christmas at Court, in the play of 'Mutius Scævola,' and continued the general, musical, and dramatic education of the boys at the Blackfriars Chambers in partnership until November, 1580, when the death of Farrant involved the scheme in financial difficulties. Widow Farrant found it no easy matter to collect her rent, Master Hunnis took unsatisfactory partners, and Sir William More was a hard landlord. At last, annoyed by repeated delays and excuses over payments, Sir William came up to town to inspect his premises in person, and there found a state of things which displeased him sorely. Windows blocked up—probably damaged; partitions taken down; and in the whole place a most disquieting evidence of play-acting. This was not to be tolerated, and the irate landlord started legal proceedings against his tenants.

At this moment, March, 1583, when the fate of the Chapel School was trembling in the balance, who should appear upon the scene but the Earl of Oxford? Without loss of time, he 'squared' the terrifying Sir William, took over the lease of the Blackfriars house, reassured the Masters, and installed his own servant, John Lyly, a bright young man fresh from the University, as responsible manager and organizing secretary of the whole concern.

* 'The 17th Earl of Oxford.' By B. M. Ward (Murray, 1928).

The reasons for this sudden and powerful move on the part of Lord Oxford were his love of music and his determination to remove the prevailing abuses and weaknesses of dramatic representation. Himself a poet and a playwright, he had suffered many things from unpractised actors and improvised stage arrangements when expected to direct occasional Court Revels, and this experience had convinced him that the only way to ensure proper performances for the Royal Entertainments at Christmas and Shrovetide was to establish a permanent private rehearsal theatre. He also realised that so long as dramatic players were classed, as they were, with rogues and vagabonds, the art of the theatre would never be treated with respect, and being an extraordinarily persuasive person, he succeeded in getting the Queen to allow him to organize the resources of the Chapel Royal as the musical and dramatic nursery for the Revels, with Blackfriars Hall as their 'Theater,' and to form a special new company of players to be known as 'The Queen's Men,' with the right to the Royal livery, regular wages, and, most important of all, the rank of Grooms of the Chamber.

Under these favourable auspices, it seemed as if the Chapel School and its allied activities should flourish exceedingly. Unfortunately, Sir William More was determined that, patrons or no patrons, his premises should not be used for play-acting, and after a year he succeeded in getting judgment in his favour for repossession.

Not much is known at present as to where the Children's training was carried on after this upheaval, but the Blackfriars premises were acquired again in 1596. Great agitation had been caused to the gentlefolk resident in the Blackfriars Precinct by the news in the autumn of that year that 'one Burbage' was intending to open the Priory Hall as a public playhouse. Some of them shared Sir William More's objections to theatrical matters in general, notably the very Protestant congregation of St. Anne's Church in the Precinct; but everyone was roused to indignation at the idea of their private, beautiful Close being invaded and degraded by a 'common playhouse.' Thirty-one of the residents signed and presented to the Privy Council a petition against this 'general inconvenience to all the inhabitants, both by reason of the great resort and gathering together of vagrant and lewd persons, that under colour of resorting to the Plays will come thither and work all manner of mischief, and also that the same Playhouse is so near the Church that the noise of the Drums and Trumpets will greatly disturb and hinder both the Minister and parishioners in time of divine service and sermons.'

Once more Lord Oxford pulled the strings, and his friend, Lord Hunsdon, the Lord Chamberlain, tackled 'one Burbage.' The protesting residents had the tempered satisfaction of knowing that there was to be no public theatre in their beloved Precinct, but, instead, a private playhouse, which from that time onwards was to be the hub of dramatic activity for England. It was here, as Rosencrantz explained to Hamlet, that the boys of the Chapel, the 'aiery of little children, little eyasses,' became the fashion and were 'most tyrannically clapped.'

Doctors differ as to the date of 'Hamlet,' but if we do not know exactly when Shakespeare was giving this tribute to the dramatic side of the Children's training, we have a substantial reference to the musical side in the diary of a foreign visitor in the autumn of 1602. The Duke of Stettin paid a visit to England that September, and on Saturday the 18th went to the Blackfriars Theatre. His secretary, who records the details of the ducal tour, makes a copious note on the event, and explains that 'the Queen maintains a number of young boys who have to devote themselves earnestly to the art of singing and to learn to perform on various sorts of musical instruments, also at the same time to carry on their studies. They have special preceptors, and in particular, excellent instructors in music. In order that they may practise courtly manners, they are required to act a play every week, for which purpose the Queen has established for them their special theatre, and provided them with a superabundance of rich apparel. All the performances are by candlelight, which produces a fine spectacular effect.' And he adds: 'For a whole hour before the play one listens to a delightful musical entertainment on organs, lutes, &c., and when we were there a boy cum voca tremula sang so charmingly to a bass Viol that, unless we except the nuns at Milan, we have not heard his equal in the whole of our travels.'

Now that we know of Sir Henry Nevill's connection with the start of the Blackfriars enterprise, it is tempting to suppose that his lady was often among the 'females of irreproachable character' who, the Duke of Stettin's secretary was surprised to find, constantly attended the performances. If she did, she may have heard two others of the pieces in her Booke—her own 'Grownde' and her own 'Qui passe'—played during the preliminary musical entertainment either by the composer himself or one of his pupils, for there is little doubt that Byrd as organist of the Chapel Royal was one of the 'excellent instructors' alluded to. But beside that, the play of the day may have been one requiring 'the peculiar military music, for which,' as M. van den Borren says in the passage previously quoted, 'Shakespeare so often gives directions in his historical plays.' For such a play, had Lady Nevill been attending a Court function, the Queen's trumpeters would have been available, but for a performance in the Blackfriars Precinct, is it not possible that the audience would have had to be content with some substitute? The petition of the residents against the disturbance by trumpets and drums in the theatre would seem to give us the clue to 'Mr. Bird's Battell,' for is it not what we may call a 'concert version' of the music for a historical play? There is the Overture, the Incidental Music, and the Finale; and now that we know the Earl of Oxford as stage-manager-in-chief to the Court Revels, we can understand that he required an easily available version of 'flourishes,' 'retreats,' 'tuckets,' 'alarums,' and so forth, for martial plays (and Shakespeare's plays must have come under his scrutiny), not to mention a standard march suitable for entrances and exits. At any rate, the 'Battell' looked at in this light appears neither 'childish,' 'naïve,' 'futile,' 'technically trivial,' nor in any other way uncharacteristic of its composer. It comes to life as a part of that wonderful age—as the 'Penny Plain' edition of the Queen's 'Twopence Coloured.'

As for its inclusion in the famous Booke, we may imagine that Lady Nevill liked it so much in the theatre that she wanted a copy of it to play in her own gallery; and if, as the tradition is, the Booke was prepared as a present to the Queen herself, Lord Oxford's March and 'The Battell' were, in the light of the history of the Chapel School, singularly appropriate items to be included. And if we to-day cannot hear them with the ears of the 16th century, we make them real when we put them into relation with the people for whom they were full of significance. No doubt there were differences of opinion about them even then.

One of Queen Elizabeth's merry courtiers, who knew how much personality has to do with performance, shall have the last word. He is referring to a ditty sung by a lover in a story:

'This Ballade, or howsoever I shall term it, percase you will not like, and yet in my judgment it hath great store of deep invention. Some will account it but a diddle-dum; but who so had heard F. I. sing it to the lute, by a note of his own device [i.e., to a tune of his own composing], I suppose he would esteem it a pleasant diddle-dum; and for my part, if I were not partial, I would say more.'

ASSOCIATED BOARD PIANOFORTE EXAMINATIONS FOR 1929: NOTES ON THE ALTERNATIVE PIECES

By Ernest Fowles

There is a touch of pathos connected with the passing of the I.S.M. examinations which, originally inaugurated with high motives, have now been relinquished for the sake of an equally high example.

On the other hand, by accepting the position with dignity and friendliness, the Associated Board has greatly added to its estimation in the minds of all observant musicians.

The volumes annotated in the following notes differ from those normally issued by the Board, each set of pieces being prefaced by a set of keyboard exercises. This procedure is a relic of the former I.S.M. practice. There is no doubt that, provided proper methods of muscular training are observed, the exercises will prove helpful, and, what is even more to the purpose, suggestive. That they are expressed rhythmically is in itself a suggestion that all keyboard problems of the kind should be similarly treated.

As with the normal Associated Board groups annotated in the November and December issues of the Musical Times, the following metronomic indications are in all cases approximations; they should, in fact, not be tested until the teacher has formed stable opinions of his own.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION

These little pieces are intended to be played in strictly moderate tempo. In view of the elementary standard of the candidates, the following markings are sufficient. In every case the crotchet is taken as the norm: I., 76; II., 80; III., 108; IV., 80; V., 108; VI., 112; VII., 80; VIII., 88.

PRIMARY DIVISION

No. 73.* Beethoven. Sonatina in G, first movement.—Moving comparatively gently and with a consciousness throughout of cantabile. Get contrast of thought in the middle section (bars 9-16) and an effect of farewell in the Coda. Take the whole at crotchet 108 or faster.

No. 74. E. Markham Lee. A Little Minuet.—Tempo as given. The piece is useful because, though in an elementary degree, it inculcates independence between the hands. Here, as in the preceding piece, the climactic part is the middle section. The music is generally well phrased; but surely the phrase-mark on the third beat of bar 8 and at other similar places should be continued to the first beat of the following bar.

No. 75. Beethoven. Sonatina in G, second movement.—Tempo about dotted crotchet 69. The music requires a gentle and persuasive lilt. Young players are prone to emphasise accompaniments of this kind and, in consequence, to miss the rhythmic charm of each phrase. Note the prevalence of cantabile, especially at the beginning of the middle section and in the Coda.

No. 76. G. H. Smith. An Old-World Measure.—All elementary music which provides discipline in simple part-movement (cf. No. 74) is of particular value. This is the main feature of this piece, which may be played about crotchet 112.

No. 77. Tchaikovsky. Italian Song, Op. 39, No. 15.—An extraordinarily effective piece, seeing that it is practically formed upon the eternal succession of tonic and dominant harmony! It is of great value in teaching the fact of rhythmic progression. The trite little phrases impinge upon accents which, in the most obvious manner, reveal themselves as the rhythmic aims or goals. Tempo, about dotted crotchet 56.

No. 78. Vera J. Huntington. Fairy Folk.—Simple 'programme music' which will make an instant appeal to little people. The contrast between staccato and legato is rather adroitly managed. It is always helpful to study the two styles with the same material. Care will, of course, be taken to ensure that the staccato element is understood and correctly practised. Tempo as given.

ELEMENTARY DIVISION

No. 79. J. S. Bach. Lute Prelude in C minor.—This was annotated under No. 14. (See November issue of the Musical Times, p. 1014.)

No. 80. Tchaikovsky. Sweet Dreams, Op. 39, No. 21.—The dual nature of the melodic side of this popular little piece makes it more difficult than appears on the surface. At first, the melodies may be practised without the accompanying chords. This will give a good idea of the 'lay-out' of the music, and probably ensure ultimate attention to the cantabile effects necessary throughout. Particularly precise observance of the tone-marks is essential. Tempo, about crotchet 88.

No. 81. G. H. Smith. Hornpipe.—Take the figuration of the first four bars as characteristic of the whole. Play these bars in strict time with the hornpipe atmosphere in the mind, and the style of the whole is revealed. Remember that a hornpipe is one of the dance-forms which require to be played as though a dance were actually in progress. An average tempo may be minim 80, but the music can obviously be taken faster with good effect.

No. 82. Schumann. Song of the Reapers, Op. 68, No. 18.—One of Schumann's simplest though sweetest songs. The simplicity, however, does not extend to its keyboard expression! Elementary players, for instance, will find great difficulty in securing a cantabile melody with accompaniment in the same hand, particularly at bar 9. Tempo about dotted crotchet 76.

No. 83. W. Wolstenholme. Rural Sketch.—Quite straightforward, with very clearly defined rhythms. The given tempo is sufficient to carry on the picturesque side of the music, and to give a rustic lilt to the simple phrases.

No. 84. Cecil Hazlehurst. 'In Olden Time.'—Contains touches which reveal a thinking mind formed upon Bach. This is the key to the interpretation. Look, for instance, at bars 14 to 16 and 18 to 23. Let these passages dominate the mind and direct the rendering of the whole. Tempo as given.

LOWER DIVISION

No. 85. James Lyon. Toccatina.—The most valuable feature of this piece is its duality in part-significance (cf. Nos. 74 and 76). In view of the nature of the music, the implied limitation in the given tempo seems altogether justified.

No. 86. Domenico Scarlatti. 'Tempo di Ballo.'—A delightful and ever-welcome piece. It can be played at a variety of speeds. Dotted crotchet 66 will, perhaps, be best for the present purpose. Both phrasing and tone markings are good. The true mordent, i.e., morda(u)nt, fashion. Slight pedalling is needful here and there, but it must be discreet, and always with the thought that its use is to make clear music like this even clearer.

No. 87. Mendelssohn. 'Song Without Words,' Op. 102, No. 3.—This demands extreme clearness of diction. The use of the pedal must accordingly be very restricted; indeed, except for purely local purposes, it may be wise to prohibit it. The music is not easy at a high speed, the direction presto perhaps being misleading. Dotted crotchet 104 should be sufficient.

HIGHER DIVISION

No. 88. Herbert F. Ellingford. A Little Fugue.—Excellent discipline for those who are beginning to play Bach's two-part pieces moderately well. The value of music in two real parts, both for keyboard study and for training in the art of listening, is not generally recognised. A book containing many simply written fugues of the kind is badly needed. The composer gives his own tempo, but I take it that this may be exceeded provided clearness be not sacrificed.

No. 89. Chopin. Prelude in D flat, Op. 28, No. 15.—This inspiration—for it is nothing less—is played in half-light. Once only does the composer raise the tone above the atmosphere of mysticism which pervades the whole. Then, however, no half measures must be taken in the attainment of the tone-summit. It is to be hoped that the stupid name often applied to this piece will be forgotten. Great music, such as this, is its own interpreter. The repeated drone-like note must, for the most part, be kept in the background. Tempo about crotchet 72.

No. 90. Frederick Nicholls. 'A Waltz Memory.'—The tempo indications given by the composer are sufficient. The music is a curious mingling of the antiquated in rhythm and quasi-modern in harmonic style. Perhaps this is the intention. Yet it is necessary to realise the make-up in two-bar and four-bar rhythms. The middle section is effective, and depends for its interpretation upon the progress of the rhythmic stress to the last sound of each of the four four-bar groups.

POINTS FROM LECTURES

Of the giving of Schubert lectures there has been no end. Their extent may be gauged from the estimate of the Centenary Celebrations Committee that over fifty thousand lectures had been applied for, and that approximately a million school-children in this country heard some of Schubert's music during the Festival week. The composer's poverty and early death have been emphasised. At Leeds University, Dr. Herbert Thompson said that if Schubert had survived to seventy he might have developed further, but would he have been the Schubert we know and love? Short as was his life, he had delivered his message. His creative activity was much greater than that of many much longer lives.

During one of the Gilchrist lectures, at Bedford, Sir Henry Hadow said that people should not run away with the idea so much fostered by sentimental musical biographers that Schubert was an unhappy, neglected genius, a sort of Richard Savage who crept about the streets of Vienna unrecognised and unhappy. He certainly hardly ever had any money, but there was no evidence that he had an unhappy life. These sentimental biographers, who had done a great deal of harm, had put it into people's heads that almost every composer who had become famous had had to fight against his family's wishes, and that somehow this made his prowess the more remarkable. It was not at all true of the majority of composers, and least of all was it true of Schubert, who was brought up in a very congenial atmosphere.

Why should any composer's works be commemorated? Answering that question while delivering an address at the Torquay municipal orchestra concert, Mr. E. W. Goss said that when one remembered the neglect from which Schubert suffered, it was a duty to see that his memory should be preserved, and his works estimated at their proper value. There was nothing sensational in Schubert, and it had often been asked what place he occupied in the world of music. In reply, Mr. Goss said that music was Schubert's natural method of expression. He thought and lived in terms of music.

Sir Hugh Allen addressed the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Sheffield on mechanical music. 'I have never yet found any great pleasure in listening to the wireless,' he said, 'but I think it would be quite wrong to say it was a danger or menace.' The spread of music by mechanical means would, in the end, bring an enormously greater number of people into the field of music, who would want far better direction than they had ever wanted before, and they would have people who really knew something about music.

Sir Richard Terry, at the Leeds Women's Luncheon Club, said that lately we had begun to discover the songs of the people—folk-songs. But these were not being sung by the people themselves. They were being sung by the 'precious people,' and the high-school girls were dancing the folk-dances. The folk themselves would never sing and dance them again, because they had been taught in the past that they were something of which to be ashamed. Startling results in music were in prospect, but one of the greatest regrets of the stranger in Yorkshire was that most of the choral societies were having to close down because people would not go to the concerts. Sir Richard thought a society should be founded to support the choral societies of Yorkshire and Lancashire, which had kept alive the choral traditions of England.

In the course of one of his lectures at Liverpool University on 'The Meaning of Progress in Music,' Prof. Percy Buck recalled how the music of Debussy was first spoken of as 'absolutely mad.' Whilst on a visit to Oxford in about 1900, Dr. Buck went to see Sir Henry Hadow, who said, 'I would like to show you this piece of music I bought in Paris last week. You will think it is the work of a raving lunatic.' Dr. Buck agreed. Sir Henry added, 'By a stroke of luck I happened to hear the work performed in Paris, and it is beautiful.' That was Debussy's 'Pelleas and Melisande.'

Teachers crowded into the Nottingham University College theatre to listen to Dr. Adrian Boult speak on conducting. He remarked that the technique of conducting was comparatively a few years old, whereas the technique of singing or pianoforte playing was hundreds of years old. In the next fifty or a hundred years, the whole idea of conducting would develop enormously. He had known conductors who got extraordinary results with their hands, and in those cases the stick was quite superfluous. Dr. Boult regarded Nikisch as the greatest of all conductors. He could say more with his baton than anyone else. He was always calm, and yet the sparks would be flying out of the end of his baton.

At Belfast, Mr. Granville Bantock spoke of the prospects of young musicians. They were now living in an age of science. It was advancing by strides every day, and superseding all individual efforts. He could quite imagine that in a very few years' time there would be no bands in theatres, picture-houses, or restaurants. The music would be supplied by mechanical means. He had heard in a London theatre the entr'acte music supplied by a gramophone with amplifier. That looked as if the future was going to be very difficult for young musicians, for the tendency was to become more and more mechanical, and there would be fewer opportunities for individual effort. In the case of the vocalist the competition would be very keen. Only a very few would be selected to make records for the people to listen to in their own homes.

At Devonshire Park, Eastbourne, Mr. Gregory Hast demonstrated the art of singing by nineteen examples of ancient and modern songs, enforced by many practical hints to singers. A few of his many simple and clear aids are these: Every phrase is a certain shape. It is entirely dependent upon the perfection of the crescendo and diminuendo; in addition, the sostenuto and melodic line must be maintained unbroken. Never drop the voice on a short note or a short syllable. Short notes are like children—the smaller they are the more you must look after them. Beware of portamento. Never slur between two syllables. There is an epidemic of this disease: influenza is less awful. Slurring and scooping should be reserved for the aged and infirm. It doesn't matter whether the words are big or little; they have all got to be in their place.

'Ballad opera' has been studied with effective results by Mr. George Whitaker, and he attracted a crowd at the Rochdale Art Gallery to hear of his investigations. He had access to the scores of about a hundred and fifty ballad operas. After examining a number of them he decided on one called 'The Farmer,' by Shield, which seemed to have more good tunes than the others. No orchestral score was in existence—only a harpsichord score with the voice part given to the right hand and the bass to the left, with an occasional hint as to the orchestration. The libretto was in the British Museum, and had to be photographed for the purposes of the Leeds production.

The seasonable subject of carols was bound to interest the members of the British Music Society at York. The lecturer, Mr. Geoffrey Shaw, pointed out that the Christian Church did not allow carols to be sung in churches for some centuries, and he quoted 'The Holly and the Ivy' as a remarkable instance of the blending of two strands, Pagan and Christian, and showed how in it Druidical and Christian rites were combined. Mr. Shaw said that the editing of ancient carols forty and fifty years ago had deprived them of much of their charm and originality. Those which conformed to the Dorian or other ancient modes had been altered to the modern scales, with unfortunate results; original carols of the Victorian period were sentimental in form and harmony, and not at all like the genuine carol. Modern writers, such as Vaughan Williams, Gustav Holst, Peter Warlock, and Martin Shaw, had succeeded in recapturing the ancient idiom.

'Some neglected but worth-while keyboard music' was heard by the Liverpool members of the Music Teachers' Association. Examples were played and commented upon by Mr. Stewart Macpherson. He pointed out the danger of concentrating attention on comparatively few outstanding or popular works. If a composer or painter got a reputation for work in a certain genre, the public would not believe he could do anything else. Sullivan lamented that no one cared to hear his serious works. The music illustrated represented Couperin, Bach, Field, Carlo Albanesi, Rebikov, and others.

What happens at church choir practices was revealed by Dr. Sydney Nicholson at the Blackburn Diocesan Conference. 'You have a choir practice on Friday nights at eight o'clock—boys at 7.30. The men slip into the vestry at 8.15, have a chat there, and wait until the Psalms are done. When they are sure the Psalms and hymns are done, they go into the church and rehearse the anthem. If I had my way,' added the lecturer, 'I would rehearse the anthem first, and the Psalms and other important things afterwards. The anthem is quite a secondary thing in a parish church; the responses, Psalms, and hymns will take practically the whole time of any proper choir. In the ten years I was at the Abbey, whatever the pressure of work I never avoided rehearsing the Psalms.'

Lecturing on Bach at the Kingston Public Library, Mr. Eric Grant said it was curious to note that Bach was being played at a slower tempo nowadays than he ever was before, which was due to the fact that he is melodic. Organists used to be under the impression that Bach's Fugues should be played fast—a totally wrong impression. The jolly, unaffected, hearty music of Bach was steadily becoming more popular through frequent excellent recitals of his works.

With an eye upon the improvement of choral contests, the Ulster Society of Professional Musicians holds examinations of teachers and choral conductors and gives lectures to candidates. Mr. John Vine gave such a lecture at Belfast, illustrated by the Queen's Island Male-Voice Choir. He summed up the most important needs of a conductor as the ability to awaken and unloose expression; to be a stimulating force and not a wet blanket; to have a sympathetic personality; to see that the fear-complex did not arise in his presence; to get a mastery of rhythm in all its aspects, which meant form, shape, and architecture. Technique was constantly changing; consequently the conductor needed to study musical history, so as to arrive at an understanding of technique. The aural sense should be developed, and a knowledge of harmony was indispensable, as well as a sense of beauty in tone-qualities. The choral conductor should be a real leader, a vital force in matters of taste, and he should feel that he had a real mission to convert people to the appreciation of the beautiful in music.

Speaking at the Ipswich Rotarian Club, Mr. L. R. McColvin saw two dangers in the present state of music. The first was that people were not taking music sufficiently seriously, and, secondly, there was a decline in the active music made by ordinary men. Playing or singing was a personal asset well worth while.

Mr. Lloyd Williams has done monumental work in Welsh folk-music research, and his lecture to members of the Montgomeryshire Society in London showed specially local intimacy. A general remark of his was that Wales has no MSS. of music prior to 1800. It had all been destroyed, except the example in the Myrvian Archæology which no one had ever explained, and concerning which there was a suspicion that even if it were revealed it would provide nothing more than a collection of accompaniments to tunes which were not written down. These opinions led to a sketch of the Rev. John Jenkins, of Kerry (Ifor Ceri), born 1770, and his remarkable collection of MSS. Many other local worthies were named. Dr. Lloyd Williams concluded with an appreciation of the editorial committee of the National Council of Music, the Oxford University Press, and the Welsh University Press, which would shortly provide an important series of works, not only classical works, but Welsh compositions and treatises. EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC Teachers of beginners should examine 'First Adventures in Music Land,' by Désirée MacEwan (Oxford University Press), a feature of which is the importance attached to the systematic development of the rhythmical sense. The book is divided into three main sections—Time, Accentuation, and Phrasing; Staff-reading; Rests, and some other matters—and makes an admirable introduction to practical work at the pianoforte. Eva Pain's 'Three Rotation Studies' are well devised for their purpose and interesting to play. No. 1 ('Evening') is for slow legato playing, and is also a good study in pedalling. No. 2 ('Hobbledehoy') is quick, and asks for staccato and marcato touch. No. 3 ('On the Downs') is a study in cantabile and pedalling (Elementary-Lower). Five pieces by Edgar Moy, under the title 'Riverside Days,' are written to verses by Rodney Bennett. They make good practice, and the left hand is not neglected (Lower). Three well-known tunes—'The Old Folks at Home,' 'Oranges and Lemons,' and 'The Keel Row'—are treated with skill and fancy by John Longmire, and make attractive little pieces. They are issued separately (Lower). All the above are from the Oxford University Press.

'Up hill, down dale,' by Arthur Baynon, consists of ten little pieces which should appeal to elementary players. They are tuneful and well-written, though No. 3 has some awkward chordal work for small hands which, to be effective, requires a proper understanding of the use of the pedal (Novello). Interesting practice for higher-grade pupils will be found in E. Markham Lee's 'Novelettes' (International Music Co.). These are five in number, and make a useful and well varied set (Higher-Intermediate). A number of short pieces by Edwin Benbow, issued separately, come from Cramers. 'And so to bed' and 'Fairyland' are attractive and flowing little essays in 3-4 time, in which the composer indulges freely in successions of sevenths and ninths. Other numbers, rather more difficult, are 'Swinging,' 'Sea Swell,' and 'Soldiers,' the last a vigorous, rhythmical piece (Lower-Higher).

Three books from Augener may be recommended. Mary H. Callander's 'Four Little Pictures' are brightly written and give both hands something interesting to do (Elementary). Fairly advanced pupils should appreciate George Aitken's 'Hampstead Pieces.' This is an admirable little suite of four pieces, fluently written and imaginative, for the proper interpretation of which neat finger-work is essential (Intermediate). 'Aids to Sight-Reading,' by Christian Schäfer, consists of twenty-five little pieces progressively arranged and grouped under various headings—sustained notes, melody playing, &c. Apart from their technical value, the pieces make attractive playing (Elementary-Lower).

An excellent album—attractive and admirable also for technical purposes—is James Ching's 'The Scarecrow,' in which a poem by Michael Franklin is re-told in the form of six fantastic pianoforte solos (Forsyth). There are some delightful tunes, good work for light, nimble fingers, and opportunities also for expressive cantabile playing for both hands (Lower-Higher). The same publishers send Helen Pyke's 'Five Zoo Pictures' and Cyril C. Dalmaine's 'A Norseland Saga.' The latter is a capital Suite of ten little pieces which will delight and benefit young players (Elementary-Lower). The 'Zoo Pictures' are rather easier. They contain some pleasing moments, but at times the writing is crude and there are a few misprints.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

'Sea Breezes,' by Jessie Furze, consists of six well-written pieces of varied character, in all of which the left hand is well catered for. They would suit elementary pupils (Joseph Williams). Rather more difficult is Edgar L. Bainton's 'Gammer's Garland,' which may be cordially recommended. It contains five pieces, some of which give opportunities for nimble fingers (Elementary-Lower). Thomas F. Dunhill's 'Puppet Dance,' in 6-8 time (vivace), will please players capable of light, quick finger-work (Higher). A 'Valse-Charme,' by Ivy Herbert, is simple and tuneful, and gives the left hand a chance of partaking in the tune (Lower). All the above are from Joseph Williams.

Dorothy Leatherdale's Suite, 'Make believe,' is a charming set of four short pieces which should readily appeal to young people (Lower). Those who are acquainted with Book 1 of 'Times and Tunes,' by Moyna Conway, should note that Book 2 is now available. It carries the course of instruction a stage further in similar fashion, providing exercises in time, interval reading, finger exercises, and pieces, and including a page of hints for teachers. Arthur Kingsley's 'Supplementary Examination Pieces' may be recommended to the notice of teachers. They are in four books—Primary, Elementary, Lower, and Higher Division—and should be useful to pupils entering for these examinations. Explanatory notes accompany each number. The above all come from Keith Prowse.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' Column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

D. F.—(1.) The 'Scotch characteristics in some of Handel's music' no more imply that he visited Scotland than that he was born there. The flavour is almost confined to the 'snap'—a feature that is found in many English tunes written in the 18th century. It was merely a matter of fashion. (2.) We have neither space nor time for the criticism of readers' efforts at composition. A good many such things are being sent, and we must really take a stern line about it. Still, we don't mind saying (if you don't mind so meagre a criticism) that both your chant and hymn-tune are but so-so. There is not much that is actually wrong, but there's no music! The chant is less characterless than the hymn-tune. Keep on trying. But don't ask the local organist to include your attempts in his service lists; and don't come to us for criticism—at all events, not too often. (We really must take a stern line.)

OPTIMIST.—You go farther than 'D. F.,' and send a whole song for criticism! 'Is there any hope for me [you ask]—a wretched amateur who has only studied harmony as far as the dominant seventh?' Your song lacks originality, and is trivial in style—a triviality not excused by the fact of the song being about fairies. (After all, if we can't pull out an extra bit of fancy and freshness for them, for whom can we?) But you may certainly hope. The song is well written and shows a feeling for effect.

NOVICE.—(1.) The weekly half-hour of voice training for your sopranos and contraltos is well worth doing, even though (as you say) they cannot carry on the work at home for themselves. Use simple exercises—plenty of sustained notes and slow passages based on the scale and arpeggio. Your own vocal training should prove useful here. (2.) The usual arrangement is trebles on the conductor's left, altos on the right; tenors behind trebles, basses behind altos. As you have only three tenors and two basses against twenty-two women's voices, you might find it better to place the tenors and basses at the end of the front row, instead of at the back. But all depends on their power, and also on whether your choir stands on a level platform or on one with a raised back. Experiment until the singers are balanced, and there you are. Never mind appearance. (3.) A conductor naturally amplifies his beat when he wants power, and vice versâ. But he mustn't amplify it to such an extent as to make it vague. Use your left hand a good deal for dynamic indications. And, above all, remember to be economical of gesture. Make your singers respond to every inch of action on your part. If you let them think that nothing less than a foot means anything, you'll soon be expected to give them yards. (4.) The singer who asked you to beat 3-4 time as if it were 6-8 put his foot in it! It's a pity you couldn't explain why the feat was impossible. The first is triple time, the second compound duple. In slow 6-8 time, beat six; in rather quick, beat two. As a general principle, beat as few in a bar as possible. Think of the bars rather than the beats, and as soon as possible think in phrases rather than bars. (5.) Ask Novellos to send you a parcel of part-songs to choose from. Mention one or two as a guide to degree of difficulty. We wish you luck in your task—a hard one, but enjoyable. Perhaps we may be allowed to suggest that you will find some help in a little book we ourselves have just written, largely with such choirs as yours in view—'A Handbook for Choralists' (Novello, 1*s.* 6*d.*).

LICENTIATE (S. Africa).—If the Teachers' Registration Council refuses to recognise certain colleges, you may be sure there is a good reason. Don't imagine that the attitude of this journal is due to jealousy or any axe that needs grinding. On the contrary: our refusal to insert the advertisements and pass lists of the institutions in question involves us in considerable loss. Having been convinced a few years ago, however, that those colleges were inimical to the cause of musical education, we took the line that we held to be right, and we intend to stick to it, despite abuse from anonymous correspondents.

G. C. C.—(1.) 'The Organ,' by W. G. Alcock (Novello, 6*s.*). (2.) 'The Organ Works of Bach,' by Harvey Grace (Novello, 9*s.*). This book, though not primarily written from the playing point of view, contains a good deal of matter concerning registration, phrasing, pace, &c. (3.) Apparently there is no book on transcribing for organ. (4.) Nor is there one devoted specially to phrasing. Why should there be? The general principles ought to be known to you; you can then apply them for yourself. (5.) The book by Dr. Alcock mentioned above contains some studies on the use of the Swell pedal.

C. A. T.—Evidently your need is for studies of the finger-strengthening type. Try any set of Clementi, Cramer, or Czerny, to suit your ability. Finger gymnastics away from the keyboard will help you. Get Ridley Prentice's 'Hand Gymnastics' (Novello, 2*s.* 6*d.*). You can strengthen your third (fourth?) finger by little exercises at the keyboard (or on a table), e.g., slow shake with it and its neighbours; raising the weak finger while the others rest lightly on keyboard or table. The chief enemy to avoid in this kind of drill is rigidity.

ALPHA.—Your hymn-tune has several incorrect progressions; it is very trite; and the sugary discord at the end of line 2 made us squirm. Don't inflict the tune on your congregation. You have a lot to learn, and there is no lack of good tunes, is there? So why use bad ones by beginners? We say this, not to discourage you from trying to compose, but to dissuade you from inflicting your early experiments on anybody outside your family circle. They can defend themselves; the congregation can't.

E. F. G.—(1.) Grieg died on September 4, 1907. (2.) There is no 'special and correct' way of memorising music. The process is usually a blend of the mental, visual, aural, and (in the case of players) digital, the proportions varying a good deal. The chief need is to be systematic. We have had no experience of the advertised methods, but we imagine that they might well do all that is claimed for them, as their basis is, no doubt, a carefully worked-out method.

SPELLBOUND.—We presume that examinees for the R.A.M. Pianoforte Diploma are not restricted to any method. As to whether the method you speak of is 'the very latest' we don't know. Our concern is far more with the effects than with the cause, and we imagine that this is the attitude of examiners. If results are good, the method can't be otherwise. But if you still have doubts you had better write to the Secretary of the R.A.M.

LAY-READER.—(1.) There is no statutory fee for the organist's services at weddings and funerals. We agree that in the circumstances you describe the organist should not have demanded a fee. (2.) The incumbent has the right of access to the organ, but it is unusual for him to invite or allow any person other than the organist to play at a service without consulting the organist. Your vicar was quite within his rights in acting as he did.

H. V. P.—We doubt if a thirty-six-year-old, who had never played the pianoforte, could hope to make anything more than very moderate progress with the harp. If your ambition is very strongly harpwards, we suggest that before going to the expense of buying an instrument, you should do a year of hard technical work at the pianoforte as a preparation, and as a means of discovering whether your fingers can be made supple enough.

G. F. S.—When we condemned the tune commonly used to 'O valiant hearts,' we ought to have made it clear that we didn't want to be asked to criticise MS. efforts of readers. Yours is quite good, though not strikingly fresh. The bass crotchets get rather fidgety. We should prefer the feeling of a slowish two in a bar to be emphasised by a sprinkling of minims in the bass.

ORGANUM.—(1.) We have no personal knowledge of any of the four, but we believe all to be good. (2.) The list of successful candidates is supplied to us by the College. Probably the omission you speak of is an oversight. Anyway, we will bring your suggestion to the notice of the Council.

F. N.—The only book known to us dealing specially with ancient Greek music is a French work—'La Musique Grecque,' by Théodore Reinach, published in 1926 by Payot, Paris (5 fr.). Novello's can obtain this for you. Apparently no English version has appeared.

J. H. R.—(1.) See replies in our July and August numbers for advice concerning pianoforte and organ duets. (2.) We know of no organ arrangement of a 'Meditation' by Delius. Probably the player used a pianoforte score. Write to him and inquire.

TECHNIQUE.—All the pianofortes you mention are good, but for obvious reasons we cannot use this column for recommending any particular make.

D. C.—We have searched various hymnals and authorities in vain for particulars as to the tune 'Rimington.'

A. L. S.—We can discover no English biography of Mascagni.

Last month 'D. H. W.' inquired concerning a book of nursery rhymes containing 'Giddy Miss Helen,' 'Miss Ann saw a man,' &c. Several readers kindly reply that they were written by Elizabeth Turner. E. V. Lucas published a selection in 1897 under the title 'Mrs. Turner's Cautionary Stories.' The publisher was Grant Richards (now Richards Press, Newman Street, W.1).

An Ottawa reader wishes to know if there are in this country, or on the Continent, any organ keyboards of the 11th century. He will be in Europe this winter, and wishes to discover how far the carillon keyboard is derived from that of the primitive organ.

X 2 wishes to obtain a copy of an organ piece by Spark, 'Handel Commemoration March,' now out of print. Can a reader help him?

[A few replies are held over.—EDITOR.]

Church and Organ Music

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

Members and friends are cordially invited to attend the distribution of diplomas to successful candidates at the Fellowship and Associateship examinations on Saturday, January 19, 1929, at 3 p.m. The President, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, will deliver an address entitled 'Retrospect and an Ideal,' after which Dr. Ernest Bullock will play upon the College organ the following pieces selected for the July examinations, 1929:

FELLOWSHIP

1. Overture . . . 'Athalia' . . . . Handel
2. Sonata in G (Slow Movement) . . . . Elgar

ASSOCIATESHIP

3. Chorale Prelude . 'Nun komm der heiden Heiland' in G minor . . Bach
4. Prelude . . . . . Charles Macpherson
   From 'The Little Organ Book.'

FELLOWSHIP

5. Prelude and Fugue in A minor . . . . Bach

At the conclusion of the organ recital, members and friends are invited to meet the President of the College. No tickets required. Tea and coffee.

Mr. W. Wolstenholme has been elected an Honorary Fellow and an Honorary Member of the College.

H. A. HARDING

THE CHORALE IN BRITISH ORGAN COMPOSITION

By CHARLES F. WATERS

The gradual process of the Reformation in this country, as compared with the precipitate changes which took place in religious affairs on the Continent, had a much less violent effect on ecclesiastical music than might have been expected. Thus we find Tallis, Byrd, and others writing for both the old and new regimes, and in the music of those whose sympathies lay with the new there can be discerned no difference in form and idiom from that of the firmest adherents to the old. Not until the return of the traditionally-trained Pelham Humfrey from his studentship abroad at the instigation and expense of Charles II., was there any deviation from the pure traditional style of ecclesiastical music. Thenceforth, particularly in the work of Henry Purcell, the new methods were increasingly well-marked. Turning to the Continent, however, the influence of the religious upheaval was both immediate and drastic. The requirements of congregational singing, coupled with some measure of prejudice against the mediæval plainsong, gave enormous impetus to the singing of chorales, which soon became a prominent feature of the Lutheran Church. Not only did these chorales grow in number, but they became more ingrained in the life and affection of the people, some being associated with special occasions and festivals, while others were in more frequent, even daily, use. The old custom of extemporising upon the plainsong having been preserved and adapted to the new basic material, there became established a definite form of organ composition—the choral vorspiel. The organ music of the British contemporaries of the choral vorspiel writers of the pre-Bach period—Pachelbel, Böhm, and Buxtehude—took the form of fantasias, similar to those written for the harpsichord; in fact, such compositions were frequently written for 'keyed instruments' without discrimination, and consisted of semi-vocal writing embellished or contrasted by rapid scale-passages, turns, and such-like ornamentations. There are a few isolated instances of the use of chorales, but these can generally be traced to foreign influences. Dr. John Bull, for example, who left a Fantasia on a Flemish Chorale besides an effective piece on an extract from the plainsong, 'Vexilla Regis,' held office at Antwerp Cathedral. An exception is afforded by Purcell's Voluntary on the 'Old Hundredth,' which is typically British as regards the method of treatment accorded to the chorale.

Following the Restoration period the output of organ music in this country—and indeed all forms of instrumental music—presents a barren appearance, and until late in the 19th century, most of the compositions for the organ were of the 'voluntary' order; there was no counterpart to the work of Mendelssohn, Merkel, and Rheinberger, each of whom, it may here be observed, made use of chorales in one or more of their compositions. Contemporary with the revival in energetic fashion by Max Reger and Karg-Elert of the classic choral vorspiel in terms of modern technique and idiom in Germany, there has been in this country an extensive adoption of national hymn-tunes as a basis of composition, which is one of the most striking and happy features of the renaissance in recent years of British organ composition.

Commencing with the two invaluable sets of chorale preludes by Parry, and his three Chorale Fantasias, the utilisation of hymn-tunes has proceeded with unabated vigour. Without slavishly adopting the methods initiated by Bach's predecessors—the coloratura of Böhm, the vocal, fugal style of Pachelbel, or the dramatic qualities of Buxtehude—reproduced markedly in the work of Max Reger, a wealth of variety in design and style is exhibited in the treatment of the chorale prelude form—or forms—by present-day British composers. On the one hand, there is the quiet prelude of small dimensions, which constitutes the most appropriate introduction to divine service (an antidote to what the report of the Archbishops' Committee on 'Music in Worship' terms 'aimless, rhythmless wanderings, dignified by the title of "improvisations," or "extemporisations"')—e.g., some of the Preludes on psalm tunes by Charles Wood, Harold Darke's setting of 'St. Peter,' Kitson's 'St. Mary,' or the set aptly entitled 'Hymn-Tune Meditations,' by George Oldroyd. On the other hand, there is the extended, fantasia type, drawing its inspiration from, but often making little direct allusion to, the chorale, and using a variety of canonic and fugal devices and thematic development, e.g., W. H. Harris's Fantasy on Campion's tune, 'Babylon's Streams,' J. E. Wallace's Fantasia on 'Heinlein,' William Faulkes's Festival Prelude on 'Ein' Feste Burg,' and Harold Darke's 'Darwall's 148th.' Or again, extending the term chorale prelude still further to include the variation form, one recalls the Variations and Fugue on 'Winchester Old,' by Charles Wood, and Lemare's Concert Fantasia on 'Hanover,' comprising an Introduction, Thema and six Variations, and a Finale Fugato.

But the utilisation of the chorale is not confined to the limits of compositions which refer in their titles to chorales or hymn-tunes. In the Harwood C sharp minor Sonata, a hymn taken from a Constance Psalter, printed about 1500, is alluded to in the development section of the first movement, appears later on in combination with the fugue, and concludes the work in two plain statements. Stanford in his 'Eroica' Sonata, written during the war, and dedicated to Widor 'and the great country to which he belongs,' used the first line of the old 17th-century French hymn, 'O filii et filiæ,' to open the first movement, entitled 'Rheims,' and the opening of the last movement, 'Verdun,' is reminiscent of this tune.

The stately nature of the chorale is eminently well-suited to the organ, and in utilising the chorale the present-day school of British organ composition is responding to the same instinct which prompted Scheidt in his 'Tabulatura Nova' three hundred years ago, or those anonymous writers whose compositions on the plainsong were published by Pierre Attaingnant as far back as 1531!

At Ripon Cathedral, on November 17, forty-seven choirs, comprising eight hundred and seventy voices, took part in the first Festival organized by the newly formed Diocesan Church Music Committee. The music was so chosen as to include something suitable for every type of choir, being a mixture of Anglican and plainsong chants, old and new hymn-tunes and faux-bourdons, and the two anthems were Tallis's simple and short 'All people that on earth' and Ireland's long and somewhat difficult 'Greater love,' the smaller and less well-equipped choirs singing only the easier music. This comprehensive method is excellent in every way. It ensures a good standard and it calls on the smaller choirs for nothing that they cannot quite well do in their own churches. Dr. C. H. Moody conducted, and Mr. H. Percy Richardson accompanied. The service was an inspiring event and should give an impetus to the work of the Committee.

The Bedford Modern School gave its Christmas term concert in St. Paul's Church on November 28, when the programme was largely devoted to Franck. Originally it had been intended to include a selection from 'The Beatitudes,' but the work proved too exacting, and it was dropped in favour of Julius Harrison's 'Christmas Cantata,' which received an excellent performance. Franck was represented by a movement from the String Quartet and a couple of organ solos, Mr. Cyril Gell playing one of the Chorals and Mr. H. J. Colson the 'Pièce Héroïque.' Mr. Colson was also responsible for the arrangement and direction of the concert, which attracted a large audience.

In our December number we reported an organ recital given at Buenos Aires Pro-Cathedral by Mr. Ronald Chamberlain, adding (on what seemed to be good authority) that it was the first event of its kind at Buenos Aires for about twelve years. Evidently our informant was mistaken, for Mr. Bertram J. Orsman, organist of St. Alban's, Holborn, writes to say that he gave a recital in the Pro-Cathedral two years ago.

A series of fifteen lectures and demonstrations of great interest and value to organists and all concerned in the construction of organs and wind instruments in general will be given at the Northern Polytechnic during the first few months of the year, commencing on January 14. The lecturer will be Dr. E. G. Richardson, of University College, London. The scheme is the result of a suggestion by the Organ Club, and was made possible by the generosity of a former President of the Club, the late Martin White. Syllabus and full particulars may be had from Mr. Ernest White, Music Trades Department, Northern Polytechnic, Holloway, N.7.

We are glad to hear that 'The Complete Organ Recitalist' has been so successful that only a few copies are left—an excellent sale of so expensive a book in a short period. The remaining copies will be autographed and sold at one guinea. The whole of the proceeds of this book are being given to the Organists' Benevolent League, which should benefit substantially from the generosity of the editor (Mr. Herbert Westerby) and the thirty-five contributors, all of whom gave their services.

Mr. Robert Parker recently celebrated his fiftieth year of service as organist and choirmaster at St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Wellington, N.Z. Though now an octogenarian, Mr. Parker is still remarkably alert. The October issue of the Wellington Church Chronicle contained eulogistic references to his work; and there was also an article on Church music—one of a series—which we read with interest.

At Streatham Parish Church on November 20, Haydn's 'The Creation' was sung by the Streatham Choral Society, conducted by Mr. F. Hubert Belton. The soloists were Miss Gwladys Naish, Miss Margery Perrott, Mr. Ben Morgan, and Mr. Bernard Buck. Mr. A. M. Hawkins was at the organ.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed in St. Mary-le-Tower Church, Ipswich, on November 29, by the choir, under the direction of Mr. George C. Gray. The soloists were Miss Lucy Goodwin and Mr. George Parker. Dr. Gordon Slater was at the organ.

The Leeds Parish Church choir, augmented for the occasion to two hundred voices, sang Brahms's 'Requiem' on December 5, conducted by Dr. A. C. Tysoe. The accompaniment was by strings, drums, and organ, the latter played by Mr. A. H. Lawrence. The soprano solos were well sung by a group of choir-boys, and Mr. Harry Burley was the baritone.

Handel's 'Samson' was performed at the Goole United Methodist Church on December 2 by the choir and the Goole Philharmonic Orchestra, both augmented for the occasion. Mr. Ernest Johnson conducted, and had the assistance of a good team of soloists.

A new organ—a two-manual of fourteen stops—built by Messrs. Eden, of Derby, was dedicated at the Primitive Methodist Church, Worthing, on December 3. Mr. Guy Michell gave the opening recital.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have recently built a new organ for Wyggeston Grammar School for Girls, Leicester—a two-manual of twenty-three stops and twenty pistons.

A selection from 'The Messiah' was given at St. Peter's Church, Nottingham, on December 6, by the choir. Mr. Stewart Selby accompanied on the organ, and Mr. Vincent W. Trivett conducted.

At St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, on December 6, the choir sang Brahms's 'Requiem,' with Dr. G. H. P. Hewson at the organ.

Mr. Gerald E. King, organist and director of the choir, St. John the Baptist, Glastonbury.

Letters to the Editor

'SCHUBERTIANA'

SIR,—May I be allowed in the interests of accuracy (or, alternatively, to provoke discussions which may elucidate doubtful questions) but certainly in no malicious or carping spirit—to suggest the correction of a few details in recent additions to Schubertian Literature?

In 'The Heritage of Music,' p. 106, Prof. Tovey speaks of 'the great String Quartet in C.' Read Quintet. Schubert composed two Quartets in C, but neither can possibly be called great. Curiously enough, the great Quintet is called a quartet also in the new edition of 'Grove' (p. 613).

Turning to the valuable Centenary number of Music and Letters we find it assumed on p. 299 that the songs 'Am Flusse' and 'Geistesgruss,' which were composed in 1815, came before 'Gretchen am Spinnrade' (1814). One also is inclined to question the sentence on p. 302:

> 'Then came Chopin [i.e., after Schumann—but were they not born in the same year, and was not Chopin's artistic development anterior to Schumann's?], who was the first to show the world what keyboard counterpoint could be.'

This startling statement is matched by another on p. 307: 'The "song" was born a hundred and thirteen years ago with Schubert's Op. 1.' Evidently art, so far from having stopped short at the cultivated Court of the Empress Josephine, had hardly begun to exist then!

P. 309: 'It was typical of the man that he did not aspire to Opus numbers until he had written "Der Erlkönig."' How 'typical'? The 'Erlkönig' was not given an Opus number until more than six years after its composition, and then simply because it was Schubert's first independently published work.

P. 334: Ellen did not sing her 'Ave Maria' 'to the proud Roderick'! The unwelcome suitor overheard the 'melting voice.' Nor was (vide second paragraph) 'The Lay of the Imprisoned Huntsman' Roderick's, as Prof. Deutsch seems to think. Roderick was dead. The singer was, of course, Malcolm Græme.

P. 368, par. 2: This suggests that the B minor Symphony was left unfinished under the shadow of death. But it was composed in 1822. On the next three pages the D minor Quartet is three times referred to as in G minor.

In the monthly reviews, those repositories of British culture, I have read articles on Schubert by Mr. F. D. Wiseman in the Contemporary and by Mr. C. Whitaker-Wilson in the Fortnightly. The former speaks of 'the great C minor Symphony of 1828.' Schubert's C minor Symphony ('Tragic') was composed in 1816, the great C major in 1828. He says the 'Erlkönig' was 'the first of Schubert's works to be printed.' The first was the song 'Erlafsee' (1817).

He says that after the public performance of 'Erlkönig,' 'publishers immediately clamoured at Schubert's door vying with one another in offers for his work.' Not at all. 'Erlkönig' and the other songs which soon followed it in print were not accepted by the publishers, but were published on commission.

Mr. Wiseman writes:

> 'Schubert added little to the development of musical thought; he made no adventures beyond the bounds of current form; his work appears to have exercised no such influence upon any later genius as did Mozart.'

This remarkable assertion may speak for itself. Only one may wonder who invented the modern German song as we know it, if not Schubert, and who, if not Schubert, was the greatest influence in the art of Schumann and Brahms. This author goes on still more oddly:

> 'It is possible that, if he had put a curb on his imagination, practised a discipline of self-control, and set himself to study more deeply the works of others . . . he might well have redeemed the "finer hopes" . . . If he had honoured his art and had devoted himself with the earnestness of a Beethoven or a Berlioz to the pursuit of a vocation, his genius would have thrived better and manifested itself in more substantial work.'

Against this, let us inquire in what esteem Berlioz and even Beethoven would have been held in comparison with Schubert if they, too, had died at thirty-one.

Another quotation from Mr. Wiseman:

> '. . . when with the assent of his own mother and the connivance of Schubert's father, Schober took the young musician to live with him at his house, liberated him from material cares, and placed within his reach the quietude and leisure suitable to his career, Schubert accepted it for a month or two and then slunk back to share the poor lodgings of the insipid poet Mayrhofer.'

Mr. Wiseman has presumably based this somewhat fantastic reading of events on a passage in 'Grove'—a passage which accounts for Schubert's life in 1816-17 in a way which modern research hardly bears out. The fact seems to be that Schubert did not leave his father's school until the autumn of 1817—and then much against his father's will. In that same year Schober left Vienna for a year's absence in his native Sweden. Schober was no doubt a good friend to Schubert, and it seems that on returning from Hungary at the end of 1818, Schubert did for a time occupy a room at Schober's mother's house when a soldier son was not at home.

But what is there in the records to substantiate Mr. Wiseman's elaborations? Schubert never, as a matter of fact, had such a lucky chance as is here suggested. Schober and Schubert were from first to last on the best terms. The former did what he could for the latter, who was more attached to him than to anyone else; and the 'slinking back to Mayrhofer' is surely a misreading of the facts.

On Schubert's art the Contemporary article does not hesitate to declare:

> 'His grasp of technique was hardly sufficient for the polyphonic requirements of instrumental writing.'

Insufficiency is then a merit! Or how is the enduring appeal of the two last Symphonies, the three last Quartets, the C major Quintet, and a mass of pianoforte works to be explained? Should not an insufficiency of polyphonic technique be encouraged in all possible ways, if such are the results? The answer to Mr. Wiseman's wiseacry is to be found in Prof. Tovey's essay in 'The Heritage of Music':

> 'Grove very rightly draws attention to the magnificence of Schubert's basses. That settles the question: a composer whose basses are magnificent is a great contrapuntist even if (like Wagner) he never published a fugue in his life.'

That decisive remark should have been pondered over by Mr. Whitaker-Wilson before he committed the Fortnightly Review to such a gaffe as this:

> 'Schubert never righted himself in the deeper technical sense all his life.'

Prof. Tovey's opinion may also be set against the Fortnightly reviewer's on the question of Salieri's teaching. The latter says:

> 'Salieri was inert. . . . He merely kept up a kind of running commentary upon anything Franz chose to show him. . . . Salieri had made rather an unwise suggestion; it was that Franz should write an opera. It was a stupid suggestion.'

Salieri has for a century been the cock-shy of the more irresponsible biographers of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. But let us listen to Prof. Tovey:

'No view of either Beethoven's or Schubert's development can be trustworthy which fails to account for the zest into which these mighty men of genius put themselves into Salieri's hands. . . Salieri was neither a preoccupied man of genius nor a pedant, but a clever and highly-cultivated Italian musician with the will and the power to give practical and interesting information.'

Mr. Whitaker-Wilson says that Schubert's father 'managed to rear a family of nineteen.' He procreated nineteen, but reared only ten. The Fortnightly reviewer gives hitherto unpublished details of Schubert's examination before entering the imperial choir, in 1808:

'His voice rang round the whole building; masters and boys stood there like statues. And when it was all over the boys . . . came forward to offer their felicitations.'

May one suggest that it is time biographies were printed in two differently coloured inks, one for fact and the other for fiction?

The subject of Schubert's relations with Beethoven has been a trap for all but the more wary of the Centenary celebrants. It would be tiresome to enumerate all who have fallen to Schindler's rigmaroles. They should have referred to Thayer before spinning new yarns.

Turning to Mr. Newman Flower's new and handsomely produced biography one finds more to disagree with in the author's manner and interpretations than in the actual facts. But Schubert did not dedicate the Duet Sonata, Op. 140, to Clara Wieck (p. 128). The dedication was the doing of the publishers who issued the work ten years after Schubert's death. There is a puzzle in the statement that Schubert's father was born in 1763, married at twenty-two, and had his first son in 1784, 'a year after marriage.' The valuable feature of Mr. Flower's book is a bibliography of more than thirty pages, compiled by William C. Smith.

At the risk of seeming captious one feels inclined to complain of a confused effect made by Mr. Flower's habit of exaggerated statement. For instance, in his account of Schubert the schoolboy:

'The physical sufferings of Schubert at this stage cannot be exaggerated. . . . He was wildly happy. He lived for nothing but his composition.'

Mr. Flower works for all they are worth the scanty hints in the records of Schubert's tenderness for Theresa Grob and the oft-repeated suppositions (for which there is no real evidence) of his passion for Caroline Esterhazy. Theresa 'was the great passion . . . beyond question.' This passion 'was steadfast and unspoken in fidelity until 1820.' Well, we know just what Schubert said. Theresa was not pretty, and had had small-pox badly, but she sang well and was a good girl, and for three years Schubert hoped to marry her—so he said years afterwards when Hüttenbrenner was so indiscreet as to press him with questions about his love-affairs. What reams of nonsense (including 'Lilac Time') have been spent in expatiation on that reported conversation!

Without more evidence than is provided by Mr. Flower one is not convinced of Schober's 'malevolent influence.' Schubert's illness in 1823-24 was very likely venereal; but again, in the absence of the facts, the reader cannot be convinced by the great play Mr. Flower makes with this misfortune. It is certain that, in spite of his forebodings in 1823-24, some of the happiest times in his life were to come, and some of his most glorious compositions. It is also certain that he died of typhus. Mr. Flower cannot in his treatment of this question be acquitted of injudiciousness and tastelessness; and it is impossible to forgive him his italics on p. 204.

All the same, his book must—however much one may dislike his style—be admitted to be the most complete biography of Schubert in our language. Mr. Flower has taken the trouble to go to good and unfrequented sources for his material. The book treats of a number of things more fully than does any other in English; and certain details are new. The account of the 'Convict' in Chap. 3, shows Grove's description of that establishment ('school for educating the choristers for the Court-chapel') to be brief to the point of inaccuracy. Mr. Flower says:

'. . . . the Convict . . . contained not only pupils of the Gymnasium (the Convict School), but also students who attended the lectures of the University. . . . The tuition was general in character, but the Convict contained scholars who were compelled to take part in the performances at the Court Church, together with the boys of the Chapel Royal.'

The Convict was, in fact, a public school at which a handful of choristers were foundationers—whereas 'Grove' calls it 'the music school.' The surprising thing is not that Schubert got so little musical instruction, but that he got so much in his school-days.

Since the book may be expected to be reprinted, may one suggest that its worth should eventually be enhanced by the revision of its loose and exaggerated language? Perhaps some examples may be cited of what is meant:

'The pendulum swung full circle' (p. 5); 'Holzer's big heart, throbbing in a fatted body, yielded nothing to mediocrity' (p. 17); 'He [Napoleon] lingered in Vienna like a scab on the flesh of a people' (p. 27); '. . . typhus, the dread disease that was to destroy her son Franz in due season' (p. 33); 'The greatest injustice the world did her [Schubert's mother] was that she never knew of the genius of Franz' (id.); 'This second wife [Schubert's stepmother] became exactly what the first had been' (id.); 'Three times did the State issue conscription papers against him [Schubert]. Three times did it make abortive attempts to kill him on the battlefield' (p. 35); 'The children [in Schubert's classes] must have wondered sometimes for what end they had been delivered into the hands of this Gorgon' (p. 36); 'Society in a wave of enthusiasm drew him [Vogl] into its innermost circles' (p. 55); 'He was not a figure of pose' (p. 56); 'In July he [Schubert] went with the [Esterhazy] family to Zelész. He had banished himself, suppressed himself anew, for the price of two gulden a lesson. Judas had sold his Master for thirty pieces of silver, and Schubert sold his Art for something less under the impetus of poverty' (p. 64); 'Zelész was a slow but certain process of death' (p. 65); 'The consciousness of Schubert to his poverty came to him at times in waves of acute feeling' (p. 95); 'Diabelli had preyed on his poverty in Schubert's unguarded hour' (p. 98); '. . . this Viennese Barabbas' (id.); 'The curse of the age was the mediocre amateur for whom much of Schubert's music was too difficult' (p. 164).

And if with revision of its diction there should go a revision of certain ill-considered interpretations of events, a later edition might fill the vacant space that is still waiting for a 'Life of Schubert' beside Thayer's 'Beethoven' and Terry's 'Bach.' As an example of Mr. Flower's interpretations I should like to cite his gloss on the well-known facts of Schubert's first visit to Zelész. Schubert's own account of the Esterhazys, brief and frank, is known to everyone. The count was rather rough; the countess proud but sensitive; the little countesses good children. Schubert never felt quite at home in their society. He was home-sick for Vienna. Mr. Flower writes thus:

'Schubert appeared to Count Esterhazy as a brilliant person whom he could secure cheaply. . . . [The Esterhazys] were people indolently rich. They paid the price of mediocrity for Schubert's genius. Having bought him by the cruelty of patronage, they relegated him to the servants' hall. It is one of the most remarkable points in Schubert's life that he endured these people. He refused music lessons in Vienna to accept them at two gulden from a titled snob. . . . But a poor man can adorn a snob by further self-suppression.'

This is, perhaps, rather more indignant than lucid.

> 'Schubert was reckoned so cheaply by Count Esterhazy that he housed him with his servants, took him into the castle salon when he desired music, then returned him somewhat tired at the end of the evening—the servile menial—to the society of a bailiff and his grooms, to the smell of horse-dung.'

But how can we accept all this without evidence? Schubert never complained of his treatment by the Esterhazys, or of the smell of horse-dung. Everything points to his reasonably good treatment. During the few months he was at Zelész he was well, and, except for some boredom and regrets for his Viennese cronies, thoroughly cheerful—to judge from the only evidence, his letters. Mr. Flower gives us a picture of the Estate Agent's house in which Schubert was lodged—a pleasant-looking villa.

'Schubert sold his Art.' The sentence reads incomprehensibly in the light of the abundant and beautiful music which, as every Schubertian knows, was written at Zelész.

'Zelész was a slow but certain process of death.' So says Mr. Flower; but not Schubert, who wrote to the Viennese circle from Zelész on August 3, 1818:

> 'I am in the best of health. I live and compose like a god, as though, indeed, nothing else in the world were possible. Mayrhofer's "Einsamkeit" is finished, and I think it is the best thing I have done, for I was care-free when writing it. I hope you are all as well and happy as I am.'

Zelész a 'process of death'! Is it not rather more likely, to judge from the improvement in Schubert's health during the second Zelész visit (1824), that a few more summers there, notably that of 1828, might well have added years to his life?

Mr. Richard Capell's new book on 'Schubert's Songs' I have not yet been able to check thoroughly, but I notice that on p. 24 he says, 'It does not appear whether Schubert came personally into touch with Jacob Nicolas, Baron von Craigher.' But Deutsch says that Schubert had an interview with Craigher in 1825. Nor does Mr. Capell say whose were the translations of the songs from Scott's 'Pirate,' 'Montrose,' and 'Ivanhoe,' which Schubert used. Deutsch (in Music and Letters) says they were Craigher's. On p. 173 the author speaks of 'the German poet' of the song 'Der Wachtelschlag,' although he has elsewhere said that it is a translation (by Sauter) from Metastasio. In general, he has not made up his mind whether to give principal consideration to the original author or to the translator of translated texts. In one of the appendices H. von Collin is said to be the translator of Colley Cibber's 'Blind Boy,' although in another entry on the same page the translation is (rightly) ascribed to Craigher.

What is the authority for Mr. Capell's spelling the name of the Esterhazys' country house as 'Zseliz'? 'Grove' says 'Zselesz,' Mr. Flower 'Zelész,' and Schubert himself 'Zelez' or 'Zeliz,' while Miss Venetia Savile, the translator of the new edition of Schubert's letters, invites us rather alarmingly to say 'Zscliz.' In so expensive a book as Mr. Capell's the index of names might have been more complete. Friedländer, the editor of Schubert's songs in the Peters edition, is frequently mentioned in the text but not at all in the index.

Mr. Capell is mistaken in supposing that 'Waldesnacht' has never figured in London concert programmes. He should consult the programmes of the old St. James's Hall 'Pops.'

I have already hinted at a criticism that in the new 'Grove' the famous old Schubert article might have been revised in the light of recent Schubertian investigations, although I heartily agree that it remains the best 'Life of Schubert' in any language. On p. 603 it ascribes the Quartets in E flat and E, Op. 125, to the year 1824, although the best modern opinion would rather say 1818

I had proposed to include in these jottings corrections of Miss Beatrice Marshall's new translation of Kobald's book on Schubert's Viennese circle; but I refrain, not knowing, if I once began, where I should stop.—Yours, &c.,

SCHUBERTIAN.

In answer to Mrs. Liebich's letter last month, there are nine Symphonies by Schubert, as follows: No. 1, in D (1813); No. 2, in B flat (1814-15); No. 3, in D (1815); No. 4, in C minor ('Tragic,' 1816); No. 5, in B flat (1816); No. 6, in C (1817); No. 7, in E (unfinished and unpublished, 1821); No. 8, in B minor (unfinished, 1822); No. 9, in C (1828).

MR. WHITAKER-WILSON AND A REVIEWER

SIR,—Your reviewer has admitted that he set out to criticise my book on Schubert with a prejudice against what he has termed 'fashionable biographical fiction,' thereby laying himself open to the gravest censure; no real critic is prejudiced. And now I am told—how correctly I know not—that he himself has written a book on Schubert. This may be quite untrue, but whether it be a fact or no, it is hardly within the confines of good taste or professional etiquette to hold up my book to ridicule. Your writer has confessed that he has marked passage after passage for question; he does not seem to have marked anything for sympathetic consideration. In fact, he is merely out to destroy the chances of the book. Not a word has been said of the value of the book as a whole; not a word upon its various discussions, its general style, or upon the matter of its being readable or unreadable. I repeat that he has yet to learn the business of a critic.

Fortunately for the book's success, other writers have thought very differently—the critic of the Church Times was one. It so happens that by an accident the proofs of my book were sent out to America to another author who was patiently awaiting his own. Although surprised and disappointed, he glanced casually over the unwelcome proofs; then he read carefully; finally he returned the proofs to the publisher with a delightful letter of appreciation. The publisher asked me to autograph a copy for him, and I have since received a letter which I shall not destroy.

Your reviewer asks for my authorities. Unfortunately, I have long since destroyed my notes which I made in the British Museum. I can assure your writer that there is nothing in that book which is not authenticated somewhere, for I read every English and German work on Schubert. I systematically searched not one, but all of them, for details. It was always a case of swings and roundabouts; what I missed in one work I found in another.

Thus, in the case of Schubert's suit, A said it was light grey; B and C said whitish-grey; D said home-made; E said ill-fitting; F said something contradictory to at least one of the others, but confirmation was forthcoming in G and H. And so I sorted it all out, as best I could. But what silly little points they all are! Your super-critic must mark them for question and leave the main themes alone! And all because they were 'new to him.' Such is his egotism; anything which he happens not to know must be wrong. He must pardon me if I lose patience with such imbecility.

I would forgive him if the whole criticism did not have such an unpleasant flavour about it; but no one cares to be unjustly ridiculed. That his intention was to ridicule he proved last month in his reply to my protest. He 'takes back' his words concerning the arrangement of the A flat Impromptu, and, instead, prints just enough to make it look idiotic. It certainly looks ridiculous as he has quoted it—just what he intended. And he does it with the deliberate intention of saying, in effect: 'There you are; read it for yourselves! Of course, the man 's an ass!'

I am ashamed, Sir, to trespass upon your valuable space in a matter of this kind, but as your critic is utterly devoid of courtesy or judgment, I must ask you to forgive me, and to print the poem as it stands:

THE FISHERMAN'S NIGHT-SONG

Ave Maria!
'Tis Night on the sea;
The day's toil is ended—
All thanks be to Thee!
. . . For ever protect us, wherever we be!

Ave Maria!
The night-tide runs by;
The moon rides the ocean,
Majestic and high—
Hail! Mary-of-Stars!
From the Fishermen sailing . . . sailing. . .

Ave Maria!
'Tis Peace on the sea;
Our night-song we offer—
All thanks be to Thee!
. . . For ever protect us, wherever we be!

Hark! now the breezes are moaning—
Hear! now the mast-head is groaning—
Faster and faster comes wave upon wave!
Ah! how the heavens are roaring—
See! how the breakers are soaring . . .

MARIA!
Hear us! the storm is up-springing—
Hear us! our death-knell is ringing—
Hear us, O Thou Who art mighty to save!
The night-storm is ended,
'Tis Dawn on the sea;
And Thou wilt protect us, wherever we be,
. . . For the sake of that Fisherman
Who walk'd on the sea!'

Whatever may be his views upon arrangements as a whole, there is nothing that any honest reviewer can hold up to ridicule in that poem. It is dignified, and a reasonable conception of the Impromptu. If Liszt could arrange 'Hark, hark, the Lark' and the 'Erl-King' for pianoforte, it is no greater sin to reverse the process. Gounod managed to live down the criticism which was hurled at him for his 'Ave Maria.' I am content to do the same, and to abide by what I have done.

This song, now published by William Reeves, has been very beautifully sung by the illustrator of my recent lectures on Schubert, and in every case it has met with the greatest acclamation.

And as for my friend Schubert, if I have the great privilege of meeting him in the next world I am quite confident that anything he may have to say will be said with knowledge, courtesy, honesty, and reasonable tolerance.—Yours, &c.,

C. WHITAKER-WILSON.

[We have not thought fit to bother our reviewer with the above letter, because it really answers itself. If a biographer commits himself to some highly controversial statements without giving his authority for them, he must not be petulant if a reviewer asks for those authorities. As to our contributor's 'prejudice against fashionable biographical fiction,' that prejudice, we hope, is shared by all who realise the importance of accuracy, and who are weary of the random methods that have made musical books as a whole the scorn of literary folk. Mr. Whitaker-Wilson makes much of the fact of our reviewer having himself written a book on Schubert. He speaks as if there were some secret about this. There was none. The review was signed by an initial that is no disguise to our regular readers, and it happens that the identity of 'C.' was made clear in an adjacent column. 'C.'s' book, however, is not a biography, and in no way does it compete with Mr. Whitaker-Wilson's work. Since Mr. Whitaker-Wilson is so anxious for an opinion that is free from influence of this kind he shall have ours. We, too, have read his book, and we say frankly that, had we reviewed it, it would have had far more severe treatment than it received from 'C.' 'Not a word was said about the book as a whole,' says Mr. Whitaker-Wilson. Here is our word: the book is bad. 'General style': we call it deplorable; only lack of space prevents us from quoting long examples. 'Readable or unreadable': the former only by those who prefer a hazy picturesqueness to clear statement of fact. Mr. Whitaker-Wilson mentions some favourable reviews: we suggest that an author, like any other public performer, must not expect to be saluted with bouquets alone. He must take adverse criticism as well; and when (as in this instance) he is unable to prove his reviewer to be wrong in any statement of fact, he will be well advised to refrain from arguing with his critic, and, above all, from calling him incompetent, tasteless, and imbecile.—EDITOR.]

CONCERT AGENTS AND PRESS TICKETS

SIR,—To your salutary comments on the vagaries of concert agents may I add one observation? Between the Musical Times, a monthly paper bound for reference, and the daily press, comes the numerous class of weekly papers. Owing to their receiving, usually, tickets for only the second or third performance of a series when an important work or artist is in question, it is impossible for such papers to keep abreast of events, except by paying for their representatives' presence (or asking the representatives to buy their own tickets, contrary to usage). In the days of the pre-war Opera Syndicate (now defunct), it was commonly believed that there were three press lists in existence at Covent Garden.—Yours, &c.,

CATECHU.

WHY NOT?

SIR,—Might I suggest that our great pianists should sometimes be invited to add to the interest of their programmes by improvising on a given subject? This was a regular and attractive feature in the performances of the great artists of former days. It would be a welcome variation on the constant succession of set pieces which constitute programmes of to-day. What is the reason that the custom was dropped? It cannot be for lack of ability on the part of the great pianists who so often delight us; it can only be accounted for by a mistaken impression that modern audiences would not appreciate the return to the old custom. There is little doubt that if pianists would sometimes let themselves go in improvisation, it would add a new interest to our concerts.—Yours, &c.,

THE LARYNX AGAIN

SIR,—In Watts-Dunton's novel, 'Aylwin,' there is a very interesting dialogue between the hero and the heroine about the voice. 'Don't you think the poor birds must sometimes feel very much distressed at hearing the voices of men and women, especially when they all talk together? The rooks mayn't mind,' said the little girl, pointing to the rookery close by, whence came a noise marvellously like that made by the field-workers; 'but I'm afraid the blackbirds and thrushes can't like it. I do so wonder what they say about it.' As the larynx is the producer of sound, why is there so much difference in the nature of the sound, in various animals? That is entirely a question of direction. Comparing the sound of a rook and a nightingale, one can hear the difference. The sound of the rook chokes up the larynx, as it were, whilst that of the nightingale flows forward evenly. The voices of the majority of men and women are undoubtedly as throaty as that of the rook. With cultivation the voice improves in quality, very much resembling the sound of the nightingale, which little bird can unhesitatingly be said to have attained perfection of sound-production. But from all accounts the human voice has a long way to go to reach the level of the nightingale, or even the thrush and blackbird.—Yours, &c.,

ARTHUR LOVELL.

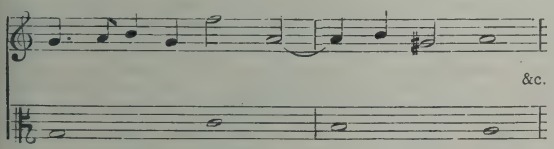
THE USE OF THE MAJOR SIXTH IN THE 16TH CENTURY

SIR,—Dr. Froggatt, in his article on 'Palestrina and the Major Sixth,' raises a question as to whether a skip of this interval was, or was not, forbidden by 16th-century contrapuntists. As far as the composers who wrote in the first half of that century are concerned there can hardly be any doubt that they recognised no rule forbidding its use. The examples given by him from Tallis and Arcadelt (whether or no this work of Arcadelt's is an 'Ave Maria') are very far from being exceptional. I collected a number of instances of this skip from Dr. Tye's works, for an article (printed in the International Music Society's Sammelbande, 1905-06) on the anthem, 'Lord, for Thy tender mercy's sake,' which also (as Dr. Froggatt will remember) contains an instance of it. One example which I printed from Tye's 'Actes,' chap. 7, bass voice, is identical with the bass passage which Dr. Froggatt quotes from Arcadelt.

The teaching of the early 16th-century theorists may probably be gathered from Ornithoparcus, who published his 'Micrologue' in 1516. (I am quoting from Dowland's translation, 1609.) His name for it is 'Tonus Diapente,' which he explains as 'the distance of one Voyce from another by a perfect Sixt. Which Stapulensis affirms to consist of foure Tones, and a lesser semitone.' He does not place it among forbidden intervals. There were intervals, such as the Tritone, and the 'imperfect fift,' which he does forbid to young beginners, but the Major Sixth is not one of these.

When, however, we come to the end of the 16th century we find that Zacconi ('Prattica di Musica,' 1596) treats of this skip in his chapter headed 'D' alcuni passi difficili poche volte usati, & della difficultà che hanno i Cantori a dirli bene'; and he gives examples, not to be copied, from Josquin, Obrecht, and Giaches de Wert. His objection (strange though it may seem to us) evidently is that this interval in difficult to sing.

Passing on to Morley ('Plaine and Easie Introduction,' 1597), we find that he will not allow this skip in his pupil's exercise :



'I think it is fatall to you, to have these wilde points of unformall skippings (which I pray you learn to leave),' &c.

But Morley uses the same skip twice, in one of his own model examples (ibid., p. 88) :

This example is very instructive, as it seems to show that the skip was not forbidden when it occurs between two distinct phrases, as in this place where the figure is repeated in the bass. My impression is that, even at the end of the 16th century, when the skip of a major sixth was apparently objected to if it occurred in the course of a phrase, it was admitted between two phrases, or where there is a break of any kind in the sense of the words. I think all the passages which Dr. Froggatt quotes from Palestrina and Byrd can be thus accounted for. Perhaps some other student may be able to throw more light upon the subject.

I should like to end by suggesting that there are two great wants, for all who are interested in Modal Counterpoint—and these are many nowadays. The first is a reprint of Morley, with a thoroughly good index. It need not be 'edited' at all, unless (as a concession to the weaker brethren) the spelling were to be modernised. Randall's edition of 1771 is nearly as hard to get as the two old editions of 1597 and 1608. The second desideratum is a really scholarly translation of Zacconi's 'Prattica di Musica.' I think I am not wrong in saying that Zacconi is much the most instructive to modern students of all the old writers on modal music.—Yours, &c.,

G. E. P. ARKWRIGHT.

SIR,—The article 'Palestrina and the Major Sixth' in the December issue of the Musical Times has finally exhausted my patience in waiting for answers to certain questions regarding the teaching of musical theory. I have not seen an expression of the point of view of the pupil—I believe mine is the first.

I have been a student for four years, my object being to stamp myself—beyond any argument—as a musician of the first class by obtaining a Mus. Bac. degree.

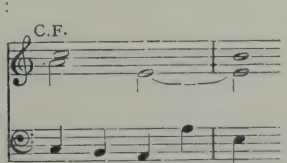
But, lo! with the October, 1927, issue of the Musical Times I received a violent shock. It contained Mr. Spanner's conclusive condemnation of Strict Counterpoint. I eagerly awaited a subsequent issue, and I was relieved to find that two distinguished scholars championed its cause.

I was somewhat reassured, but grains of doubt still remained. Then came, in the November issue of this year, Sabaneev's article on 'The Crisis in the Teaching of Theory'—a glaring accusation against professors and teachers of impassiveness and ignorance of the fundamentals required for a genuine musical training.

I decided to analyse my own attitude towards the training I had received.

I have been guided by many teachers—all, of course, graduates in music. Before I had digested the laws, as a child digests his tables, I used to write 'crude' progressions. 'Yes, that would be quite nice, but you have fifths. . . . ,' and that had to be discarded and something substituted that appealed to me far less. Yet, if I turned to the pages of a great Master—especially the modern ones (and was I not modern ?), bars of such fifths glared pertinently at me.

And Counterpoint! Was ever devised a more perfect method for suppressing self-expression ? Even within the subject rages a sea of controversy and doubt. I am told I should not let my melodies leap a major sixth, I should not proceed by the interval of a seventh, or by any compound interval, even with one note in between, &c., &c. Yet, turn to Palestrina, the recognised authority! And—crime of crimes!—Bridge in his Primer uses the interval of a seventh with one note in between (p. 52)! But I have found the human touch, if only for a moment. In a text-book on Counterpoint I find the author says, in the case of exposed fifths, 'The student must be guided by his musical sense. . . .' What a blessed oasis in a desert of law and order! But even here I find a snag; when I write :



it is censored—and I assume I have no 'musical sense.' Many times, after being accused of taking liberties, I have produced my text-book in evidence. Then I hear, 'You see, I don't know what Blank does permit: his book is a very modern one.' And so my faith wavers.

In the working of figured basses I have been told not to work them as I would work a sum. It had never even struck me that this was possible in an art such as music. Is music, then, mathematics?

Now comes the 'unkindest cut of all.' For four years have I spent time, money, and labour. I have worked, for a purpose, hundreds of Canti Fermi and exercises, and finally I am told by such an authority as the Musical Times that 'harmonic and contrapuntal exercises are not music'! What, then, are we students doing? We can only demand an explanation, and possibly a complete revision of the method and substance of Theoretical Training.

I wonder if other students have experiences and feelings like mine?—Yours, &c.,

STRING BALANCE

SIR,—At the Buxton Conference of the British Federation of Musical Competition Festivals the proceedings included a short discussion on 'Strings' in relation to the Festivals. As one of the speakers, I tried to keep to a single vital point, namely, the present wretched lack of balance in the make-up of nearly all amateur string bands at the competitions (for example: twenty violins, one and a half violas, two 'cellos, and no double-bass), and the need for a better ideal standard regarding the balance of instruments. In passing, I happened to praise, by comparison, the balance of the famous Vingt-quatre Violons du Roy (Louis XIII.), which was 6-6-6-6. Your correspondent in his report of the Conference (December, p. 1126), who is apparently unaware of the historical facts, credits me with the idea and calls it a heresy!

As your report quite correctly declares, the actual 'debate' was unsatisfactory and inconclusive. Yet it was not entirely unfruitful. On October 20, The Times had a whole-column article, headed, 'Amateur String-Playing: A Stimulus Wanted.' The well-informed and practical writer of The Times article took, as his text, the Buxton discussion, 'starred' the topic of balance exactly as I had done, and ended by proposing a Summer School for 'Strings.' Next, the Musical Times (December, p. 1121) printed a letter from the secretary of the Federation, in which the writer referred to The Times article, and repeated the proposal for a Summer School.—Yours, &c.,

[P.S.—The evidence for this curious fact as to string balance is in Mersennus, quoted by Hawkins in his vol. iv., chap. 8, footnote.—J. B.]

INFORMATION WANTED

SIR,—May I ask for your help in obtaining information on the following point?

I am desirous of ascertaining whether there is any general experience to confirm the theory that sounds in combination lose some of their volume—that is, that the volume of separate sounds is diminished when their vibrations are simultaneous with those of other sounds.

If any of your readers are inclined to make the experiment I shall be grateful if they will communicate the result to me on a postcard. I suggest adopting the method of sounding a three- or four-note chord, and then releasing all but one of the notes and observing if the remaining sound appears to acquire increase of volume when its vibrations stand alone. On the organ this is easily done, but on the pianoforte equality of touch needs attention. Besides the chords, the octave with its various interval subdivisions can be tested, and I should be particularly glad to hear if the major third and diminished fifth from the lower tone are noticeable in this respect.

A mere 'Yes' or 'No' will be sufficient, but details will be of interest, and I shall appreciate any information I receive.—Yours, &c.,

BATTISTINI

SIR,—May I, as a personal friend of the late Commendatore Mattia Battistini, supplement the appreciative obituary notice which appeared in your December issue. He last appeared in London on June 1, 1924, when, with Madame Salteni-Mochi, he gave a concert at the Albert Hall, as he had done on the repvious Sunday. Of the latter concert the writer of a notice in the Daily Telegraph of May 26 wrote as follows: 'It may be doubted whether Signor Battistini, great artist though he is, has ever in recent years given so fine a proof of his accomplishments as he did in the course of the programme which he shared with Madame Salteni-Mochi at the Albert Hall yesterday afternoon. In these vast spaces the magnificent volume of his tone seemed even more imposing than it had been at Queen's Hall a few days ago, while in point of subtlety of inflection his work was once more unsurpassably fine.'

It was, I know, a source of great grief to him that he was not invited to sing at the Opera in London. I wrote some time before his last illness, and suggested a visit to London, to which he replied (of course in his own beautiful language), 'Come to London. I would with joy, but no agent invites me—they do not want me.' This is possibly comprehensible when the operas in which he made his greatest successes, such as 'Don Giovanni,' 'Thaïs,' and 'Hérodiade,' no longer apparently attract a public which appears content to listen to mutilated translated opera on the wireless, suddenly interrupted (as happened recently) to make room for a lecture on Borstal. It is evident that the opera public which existed before the war has died out. Few probably remember the glorious occasion when, on July 17, 1906, Battistini appeared (for the last time, I think, in opera, in London) in 'Don Giovanni,' in company with Destinn, Caruso, Journet, Gilibert, and Marcoux. The present generation apparently has no conception of what the word 'opera' implies, if it will tolerate performances of Italian opera with German artists. I was not present, but I was told that the last performance given of 'Les Huguenots' was pitiable.

In the very last letter Battistini wrote to me he described me as the defender of the Italian school of singing. I am proud of this. When, on May 29, 1924, he came to lunch with me, bringing a rival baritone then appearing at Covent Garden (namely, Signor Formichi), he insisted on singing his beloved 'Ideale' as he alone could. In addition, he not only sang but acted the beautiful duet, 'La ci darem,' with Madame Salteni-Mochi. Mr. Ben Davies was present, and met for the first time the great baritone. Davies, at my request, sang to him, after which Battistini fell on his neck and kissed him, saying, 'You will sing till you die. You have the true method, and I think I have the same.'

It is a pity that young women, who may possibly have had twelve lessons, should attempt such great arias as 'Casta Diva' on the wireless, which only a Patti could successfully attack.—Yours, &c.,

At the annual general meeting of the Incorporated Staff Sight-Singing College, on November 24, before a large attendance, Mr. George Aitkin gave a Schubert lecture. The report on the year's working of the College showed a large increase in the number of entrants for examination.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we inserí, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Young lady (amateur violinist) wishes to meet accompanist for mutual practice. Brixton or Streatham districts preferred.—M. M., 59, Bramah Road, N. Brixton, S.W.9.

Lady pianist wishes to meet advanced violinist for mutual practice of classical music. Liverpool or district.—M. C. M., c/o Musical Times.

Mezzo-soprano wishes to meet accompanist for mutual practice.—F., c/o Broad Street Station Music Stores, E.C.2.

String bass and violin (lady and gentleman) offer their services on Sunday evenings in good orchestra or octet. Light or classical music. London.—M. N., c/o Musical Times.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of January, 1869:

A COPY of the Oxford Undergraduate's Journal has been forwarded to us, in which appears a letter signed 'A professional musician behind the scenes,' giving the true account of an incident which occurred at Mr. Sims Reeves's Ballad Concert, lately given at Oxford. It seems that Madame Patey-Whytock had been encored in a song; that she returned to the platform, bowed her acknowledgments, but refused to sing again. Hereupon rose the usual storm of shouts and hisses invariably raised by a British public, whenever an artist declines to do double duty; in the midst of which Herr Willem Coenen appeared to perform a pianoforte solo. In spite of this tumult, which rose and fell at intervals, Herr Coenen played what was set down for him on the programme, and retired amid enthusiastic applause. The effect of the disgraceful noise which he had been subjected to, however, so affected his nervous system, that he had barely succeeded in reaching the artists' room when he fell down in a swoon. . . . . If this be the true version of the affair, we think it simply a disgrace., . . . and we, who have always steadily opposed the system of encores, shall be glad on all occasions to support vocalists who will do their utmost to resist a custom which has now grown into a national nuisance.

Competition Festival Record

COLNE (December 7 and 8).—The thousand competitors included brass quartets, thirty-nine sopranos, and the members of some famous choirs. Todmorden headed the chief male-voice class, Keighley Glee Union being second and J. Nelson's Glee Union third. Read and Simonstone Vocal Union was first in the mixed-voice class, Nelson Glee and Madrigal being second by a mark.

HALIFAX.—Two crowded days, November 23 and 24, attracted well over two thousand competitors, of whom half were heard on the Saturday in the mixed- and male-voice choirs. In the former class there was a close struggle between several old friends, who had foregathered a few weeks earlier at Blackpool, and also at Morecambe. Twelve mixed-voice and seven male choirs entered, all of them highly skilled organizations. Blackpool Glee and Madrigal carried off the 'Lady Bulmer' trophy in the mixed competition, Sowerby Bridge being second and Halifax Madrigal third (only one mark behind the second). Of the male choirs Greetland came first, crowning its work with a magnificently melodramatic staging of 'The Phantom Host.' Hebden Bridge and Gorton were second and third. Elementary and secondary school choirs came along in greater numbers than before (fourteen in all); only the Church choirs were shy. There was plenty of excellent promise among the soloists, if no strikingly outstanding achievement. This Festival is clearly a splendid training ground for Yorkshire's young music-lovers.

LONDON SOUTHERN AREA.—This Festival, held annually at Wandsworth Town Hall, has grown in the place of the Festival which departed to Westminster and became the London Festival. The growth has been luxuriant, and it took about two weeks during November to cope with the mass of solo singers and players and others who were attracted by the all-embracing syllabus. In spite of all its complications the Festival passed off with great success, for which the chief credit goes to the hon. secretary, Mrs. Lester Jones. The leading prize-winners in the choral classes were: Crawford Girls' Club, Norwood (Miss E. K. Walter); Florian Lady Singers, Wandsworth (Mr. J. Booth); New Musical Society (Mr. H. Purkis); Lourdes School, Norwood (Miss E. K. Walter); Old Battersea R.C. School (Miss E. Moriarty); Wix's Lane School, Battersea (Miss F. Watson); and Sleaford Street Girls' School, Battersea (Miss G. Spink).

MILLOM (November 29-December 1).—The eighth Festival was well supported by competitors of all kinds, and the third day was ended with an important meeting of expert choirs. The male-voice section was of exceptional interest, only two marks separating Barrow Bach Choir (Mr. W. Broome), the winners, from Barrow Madrigal Society (Mrs. T. M. Bourne). The positions of these two choirs were reversed, again by a small margin, in the mixed-voice section. One of the best performances of the Festival was given by Millom St. George's Girls' Choir.

NORTHAMPTON (November 14-17).—The Eisteddfod was as popular as ever, and produced some interesting competitions. One of the winners was a six-year-old violinist from Manchester. In the chief choral competitions the prizes were won by Bedford Liberal Club (Mr. W. H. Barker) in the male-voice section, and Northampton Co-operative Choral Society (Mr. W. C. J. Grant) in the female-voice and mixed-voice sections.

PLYMOUTH (November 20 and 21).—At this Festival, organized by the local centre of the B.M.S., the young players were in the ascendant, especially the violinists. There were few choirs of children, and still fewer of adults; special distinction was won by Sherwell Church Choir (Mr. W. B. Leverton) and Plymstock Amateur Operatic Society, not only for excellent singing but for being the only entries in their classes. In a syllabus of British music an exception was made in favour of Schubert for an own-choice solo song competition. The choices of four ladies were: 'The Young Nun,' 'Hymn to the Almighty,' 'My Home,' and 'Peace.'

SOUTHEND.—This is one of the centres where the competition festival idea has fallen on fertile ground and flourished of its own accord. This year's Festival, which began on November 8 and lasted out the following week, had eighty classes with an average of nearly ten entries to each, and the organizers and competitors went about their work as if they felt that the Festival was a normal and necessary part of the year's round. No brilliant results were produced, but there was a good level of musical quality in the performances, and the Festival showed a general growth and advance. Among the new classes was one for Women's Institutes, won by Ramsden Bellhouse Choir (Mr. F. G. Carruthers). String-playing showed a small decline, but there was a good String Orchestra competition, with Mrs. Ernest Sharpe's Orchestra leading two others. Organ-playing was revived, after a lack of players in the preceding year. A day was well occupied with folk-dancing, and two with elocution. The winning adult choirs were Madame Parry's Ladies' Choir and Prittlewell Glee Society (Mr. F. D. L. Penny).

Taunton (November 21 and 22).—This was a revival after a year's lapse, with an encouraging result. The brightest class was that for Girls' Friendly Societies and the like, and the best in the class was the choir of Clark's Works, Street, which was just ahead of Wellesley Music Makers' Guild. The principal choral winners were Taunton Operatic Society and Wellington Male-Voice Choir.

[Other important autumn Festivals, which we regret to have to pass over in summary fashion, were: North London, held at Kentish Town in November; the new and promising Festival at Woking, opened on November 24 by Lady Betty Balfour as first President; the Choral Competition of the East Kent Federation of Women's Institutes (held every two years) at Dover on December 5; the fourth annual Competition for schools at Torquay, the ever-popular Londonderry Feis; Bacup (organized by the local ambulance); the fifth Festival at Consett, where four first-class northern male-voice choirs met; the two-days' children's Festival at Eccleshill, near Bradford; the three days' Festival at Sutton and Cheam, S. London; the flourishing Eisteddfod at Swindon; the growing two-day Festival at Wadebridge; and the 'Dawson' Festival at Warrington, where the well-known Colne Orpheus Glee Union sang brilliantly for practically full marks.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY BALLET SOCIETY

A Ballet Society has been formed at Cambridge under the patronage of distinguished dons and well-known professional dancers like Madame Lydia Lopokova, Miss Ninette de Valois, and Miss Molly Lake. But the true begetter of the Cambridge University Ballet Society is a Japanese undergraduate of Trinity, Mr. Kei Kurosawa, who combines the sedate mind of the philosopher with the agile body of the athlete.

The first meeting of the Society took place on May 5, when three ballets were performed—'Primavera,' with music by Richmond Dabell (inspired by Botticelli's picture); a Divertissement with music assembled for the occasion from various sources; and 'Smorgasborg,' an extravaganza which first revéaled Mr. Kurosawa's talents as a dancer during the May Week celebrations last spring. In all these the accomplishments of the company were evident. Miss Molly Lake, Madame Georgina Wright, and Mr. Kurosawa attained to a standard of excellence entirely unexpected from dancers not 'under the direct supervision' of a Cecchi or a Diaghilev. The Swedish extravaganza, 'Smorgasbord,' was nothing more than a grand rag; but the Divertissement was not more disjointed than divertissements are wont to be, and 'Primavera' was a distinctly ambitious and on the whole successful effort.

The only element wherein one felt some disappointment was the music, which left something to be desired in execution if not in conception. One is of course aware that perfection is not to be expected with a hastily assembled orchestra composed mainly or wholly of amateurs. But there were players in the Cambridge orchestra who seemed quite equal to average difficulty. It would seem advisable in the circumstances to assign a more modest share to these instrumentalists whose co-operation, obtained with difficulty, is less reliable technically. This need not put an undue limit to the resources of a modern composer. A good many orchestral effects now in vogue—like quarter-tones, glissandos, and the rest—come quite naturally to a beginner. Not all the artifices of that great work familiar to violinists of a generation ago, 'Farmyard Noises,' have been exploited. Composers with a less reckless turn of mind, on the other hand, should cultivate the utmost simplicity—it pays.

Mr. Richmond Dabell's music was always interesting. But we should probably have defined it 'delightful' had the performance been more adequate. F. B.

THE HASTINGS FESTIVAL

It is just eighteen months since the White Rock Pavilion at Hastings was opened, and the town was provided with a concert-hall which would be an adornment to any city. Indeed it is just of the size and acoustic excellence which are badly needed in London, where there is nothing to accommodate a small orchestra and an audience of about a thousand. Mr. Basil Cameron has an orchestra which is worthy of the hall. Himself at one time a string-player in Sir Henry Wood's orchestra, he has disciplined his strings so that they bow with a unanimity which would provide a useful object-lesson to many London orchestras. The other sections of the orchestra are good, too, the clarinettist and drummer being exceptionally fine players. We do not often hear the timpani played with so much sensitiveness to shades of dynamic or with such accuracy of intonation. Too often the notes are just banged out as a mere percussive noise.

For the brief Festival which was given towards the end of last month, the orchestra was augmented by a few players from London and elsewhere, but these supernumeraries took a subordinate place and were there merely to increase the tone, not to give a lead to less competent performers. A number of distinguished guest-conductors, including Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Thomas Beecham, and Sir Henry Wood, shared with Mr. Cameron the direction of the concerts, and among the soloists were Madame Landowska, Mr. Solomon, Miss Carrie Tubb, and Mr. Frank Titterton.

The second concert of the four was devoted mainly to novelties, among which were Peter Warlock's 'Capriol' Suite, an Intermezzo for a Chinese Play by Herbert Bedford, three Exotic Dances by Norman O'Neill, and some songs and two orchestral pieces by Maurice Besly. None of these works are of great importance, but most of them made pleasant hearing, especially Warlock's Suite. This was a new version for orchestra of the arrangement for strings of some dances from Arbeau's 'Orchésographie.' The scoring is delightful, and Warlock is extraordinarily successful in preserving the spirit of the originals under the stress of modern orchestral idiom. The end of the last dance in the Suite perhaps transgresses a little beyond the limits of his theme, and this movement sounds better in the version for strings; but what he loses here is more than made up in the Pavane for wood-wind and brass.

However, the most important feature of the Festival was the excellence of the performance of well-known works, such as Mozart's 'Haffner' Symphony, the love-duet from 'Die Walküre,' Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, and Rachmaninov's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor. Mr. Cameron is not content with hack performances, however hackneyed the music, and his care for the details of Wagner's score at rehearsal was an instructive instance of his careful methods, which bore such good fruit at the actual concerts. London Concerts

MR. TICCIATI

At a recital in Æolian Hall, on November 29, Mr. Ticciati gave the first performance of a new Pianoforte Sonata of his own composition. It is a full-length work of considerable dimensions and great technical difficulty. All this note-spinning did not, however, amount to very much in the sum, and one came away with the impression of having heard yet another of those pianist's compositions which are so empty of thought and so lavish of bravura. One may be in error, for Mr. Ticciati certainly did not make anything very coherent out of Mozart's Fantasia in C minor, and was hardly more successful with the rather less difficult Sonata in the same key. The Fantasia demands an exceptional grasp of structural outline on the part of its performer, or it falls to pieces. It is possible that Mr. Ticciati's Sonata presents some similar problem, which he was unable to solve; but, it must be added, it is not probable. D. H.

B.B.C.

The B.B.C. concert in connection with the Contemporary Music Society provided much food for thought and some little amusement. The antics of choir and orchestra in Josef Matthias Hauer's 'Transmutations' undoubtedly tickled an audience tired by difficult music and wearisome intervals. The more Hauer transmuted, the more it seemed to be the same thing. But it was natural that the audience should have liked the game. It is always entertaining to see a kitten chasing his own tail—the more determined the kitten, the greater the joy of the spectator. But there was nothing amusing in the very long 'Symphonic Music' of Ernst Krenek's or in the Hindemith work. These men are deadly in earnest, as only men utterly devoid of a sense of humour can be.

It is, of course, impossible to discover which particular new theory lies at the bottom of this music. But one feels confident that the case would not be overstated by affirming that these pioneers have determined to do away with all that could possibly unite the music of the present to the art of the past. More than one modern painter delights in drawing the human figure without a head or with a simple smudge in its place. Krenek and Hauer represent their counterpart in music. No doubt scientists will follow their example and maintain, with unanswerable logic, that if our heads were cut off at birth we should avoid not one but all the ills human flesh is heir to. F. B.

THE VIENNA QUARTET

The Vienna Quartet, stroked from bow-side as a waterman would say, owing to the leader's right-handed way of holding the fiddle, played a Viennese programme to the Music Society on December 4 in the cellar at Tufton Street. It is beautiful quartet-playing, whether the music be Schubert, Brahms (A minor Quartet), or Zemlinsky. In the 'Death and the Maiden' Quartet the music seemed to be propelled by a life of its own and to play itself, so smooth is the ensemble. The violoncellist is a player with very positive qualities; it is not usually realised how largely the character of a quartet is determined by the way the bass-line is handled; in this combination he contributes more than his share towards the richness, strength, and softness of the total effect.

Zemlinsky, a contemporary Austrian domiciled at Prague, writes in the pithy, dissonant, modern style, and exploits most of the devices of string-playing. The work was by no means uninteresting, and was played with full understanding of the way these softly-grinding dissonances are to be handled if their atmosphere is to be captured undistorted. But it did not sound on one hearing to be less experimental than a good many other works of this type. F. H.

PRO ARTE QUARTET

The Belgian Pro Arte Quartet gave us a very fair specimen of modern music at its concert in Wigmore Hall. Paul Hindemith is now looked upon as the rising star of German music, and even some whose attachment to the classics is beyond question have been debating whether they could conscientiously transfer their allegiance. This attraction is not difficult to understand. Hindemith, an experienced quartet player, is steeped in the classics, and began writing music which frankly imitated them. The spirit of the times or some similar course has induced him to set a more adventurous course. But just as in his wildest effusions he retains something of classical clarity, it is permitted to suggest that he also retains the spirit of the disciple. The skin may be, to the touch, like the lion's; but the voice is that of the lamb.

The Quartet was exceedingly well played, as was also the great Beethoven Quartet, Op. 130, which the Belgian musicians performed, as originally intended, with the 'Grosse Fuge' at the end. F. B.

ZIKA QUARTET

We had hoped that the Czechoslovakian Zika Quartet of Prague might re-evoke memories of the Bohemian Quartet which, thirty or forty years ago, showed that a free interpretation of the classics does not necessarily spell lack of reverence or understanding. Those hopes, however, were disappointed. Messrs. R. Zika, H. Berger, L. Cerny, and L. Zika are players of ability and intelligence whose readings are only a shade unconventional, whose ensemble is respectable. But the art of quartet-playing has been brought in recent years to an extraordinary degree of perfection, and the present-day audience expects a certain subtlety and refinement. These qualities we did not find in the interpretation of Smetana and Haydn given by the Zika Quartet at Æolian Hall. F. B.

MR. BONVALOT AND MISS CHURTON

The modern craze—or, shall we say, need?—for new sensations has induced a few daring moderns to imitate the ancients, who believed that there is much virtue in a couple of fiddles. Mr. Bonvalot and Miss Churton could thus draw from both ancient and modern for the programme of the recital they gave at Wigmore Hall. As both players realised in unusual degree the duties of ensemble, this was one of those cases in which two fiddles were distinctly better than one, and we thoroughly enjoyed the unusual experience. The music of Lœillet (an old French composer unknown to us) found a counterpart in Darius Milhaud, and Handel was matched by Goossens. And, on the whole, the moderns stood the test remarkably well—partly because Milhaud was not at his fiercest, partly because Goossens understands the genius of the violin, and in part also because the performances were meticulously careful and balanced to perfection. F. B.

ISOLDE MENGES

The present generation has little patience with virtuoso music, and the present generation is wrong. Admittedly such music requires some patience on the part of the listener and a good deal more on the part of the interpreter. But it should not be forgotten that technique, whether of the pianoforte or the violin, owes a great debt to the outpourings of the virtuoso, and there are, moreover, players who can display their technical accomplishment gracefully. Miss Isolde Menges is one of them, and there was nothing in her playing of the Ernst Concerto in F sharp minor to which one could reasonably take exception. This is, for some, the most difficult of all violin concertos, since it holds hardly a line which does not make some special demand on the performer. Miss Menges played it with extraordinary smoothness, and the tone remained warm and without asperity to the end. She is beyond question one of the most notable violinists now before the public, and the brilliance of the Ernst performance was matched by a most admirably clean and lucid reading of a Nardini Concerto. WESTMINSTER ABBEY SPECIAL CHOIR

Two Motets of Byrd's and two Psalms of Holst's stood at either end of the programme of English sacred music sung by the combined forces of the ordinary and the special choirs in Westminster Abbey on Monday, December 10. The only intervening composer was William Child, whose Motet, 'O Bone Jesu,' showed the use of an independent organ accompaniment in the manner of Gibbons and the beginning of the decline in polyphonic Church music in the 17th century, in spite of the considerable beauties which warrant an occasional revival such as this one. Anthems by Charles Wood, Richard Walthew, and Ernest Bullock (who conducted) reinforced the contemporary side of the programme. Yet 'contemporary' is not quite an accurate description, for Walthew's 'I have lifted up mine eyes' is frankly Victorian, not to say Mendelssohnian, in feeling, and was quite uncomfortably out of keeping with the rest of the programme. Charles

Wood's 'Expectans Expectavi,' like everything he wrote, has a lyrical beauty that never becomes merely sweet (though it is noticeably sweeter than Holst or any other of our strictly contemporary composers), because of its extreme purity.

The choir sang excellently throughout, though the difficulty of Byrd's 'Cantate Domino' robbed it of some of its exultation. 'Exsurge Domine,' however, was sung with a conviction that amounted (as it ought) to passion on the last two pages. Organ solos (played with admirable rhythm) provided variety in a performance that made for refreshment of spirit. F. H.

'HERCULES'

Sir Thomas Beecham's revival of Handel's 'Hercules' at the Philharmonic concert on December 6 was hardly so brilliant an affair as 'Solomon.' Everyone will sympathise with Sir Thomas in his sufferings from the accident which prevented him from finishing in time his revision of the score, and which necessitated his sitting down during most of the concert; and it will be recognised that this autumn, what with his campaign for his opera scheme and other things, he has done two or three men's work. None the less, it was regrettable that a Philharmonic performance of a nearly forgotten masterpiece should have so obviously lacked the finishing touches.

'Hercules' is really unmanageably long for modern conditions. About two-thirds of the work was sung at this performance, and that made two and a half hours of music. The comparative unimportance of the choruses militates against it. Some of the choral numbers are splendid music—thus the stately 'Filial piety,' the brilliant 'Crown with festal pomp,' which Sir Thomas had gingered up with telling but not indiscreet scoring, and the original D minor movement, 'Wanton god.' But others are perfunctory, and dull.

There is really too much in this drama of Dejanira's fatal jealousy for Handel, with his vast and leisurely style, to grasp comfortably. And the happy ending seems forced and weak.

Nevertheless, what splendid music! While the plot is developing one song after another—in particular those of Dejanira and Iöle—has sap and vivid character. Dejanira obviously engrossed Handel's interest. This superb part was sung by Miss Stiles Allen, who to-day is probably our best oratorio soprano. She produces a beautifully even, unforced tone. She was happiest in the plaintive airs at the beginning, and she also sang the animated 'Begone, my fears,' consummately. The great scena of Dejanira's despair, 'Where shall I fly?' did not fall so well within the range of her art.

In contrast to this queenly voice was Miss Dora Labbette's tremulous pathos in the music of the captive Iöle. Miss Labbette skates sometimes on thin ice. In the interests of laxity she makes a hardly adequate effort, and in Handel's long arias the effect may tend towards weakness and monotony. Iöle's part, however, suited her, and she had one of the successes of her career.

Mr. Horace Stevens sang as Hercules with vigour and dignity. The part is, oddly enough, secondary. Handel has given the hero cheerful but not sublime strains. The tenor music, which Mr. Tudor Davies sang, is again not of the first interest. Mr. Davies still bottles up his voice in such a way that one can only guess how splendid and powerful it might be. He habitually smothered his 'eh' vowels. He seemed not to be able to enunciate the word 'taste.' One has the impression that if only he would allow the mere words to flow naturally, he would at one stroke be a superb singer. Could he not, perhaps, forget for a spell all that he has ever been taught about the production of vowels? The excuse for going into this singer's method in a way that may seem impertinent is sincere admiration combined with a conviction that he is not doing himself justice.

The small contralto part was sung richly by Miss Muriel Brunskill. Why do contraltos have such difficulty over 'sh'? Miss Brunskill thickened 'train' into some such ugly sound as 'trurn.' C.

B.B.C. BUNYAN-SCHUBERT CENTENARY CONCERT

The Symphony Concert of November 23 was the occasion of a first performance, and of the debut of a new choir, Granville Bantock's 'The Pilgrim's Progress' being sung by the National Chorus. The work had been commissioned by the B.B.C., and some surprise was felt at the lot falling on Bantock. At least three other prominent English composers occur to one as being temperamentally more fitted to deal with Bunyan. The new work is a kind of oratorio, with much in it that suggests stage possibilities. The libretto is by Mr. Bowker Andrews, who has drawn on the Bible, Milton, Bunyan, and himself, the result being an unconvincing medley, lacking in characterisation. The music is unequal. The long double fugue for orchestra, descriptive of 'Vanity Fair,' is as brilliant and satisfying as anything of Bantock's; and there are other moments no less characteristic. Apart from these there is little originality, and the hearer was reminded in turn of many sources, from Hymns A. & M. and Sullivan to Strauss and Wagner. Much had been written beforehand of the speed with which the work had been composed. The fact was held up as a merit; it may now be regarded as an excuse. In fairness, however, let it be added that the reception was enthusiastic. The chief soloists were Messrs. Trefor Jones, Harold Williams, and Keith Falkner, the last-named doing fine work as an eleventh-hour substitute for Mr. Norman Allin.

The National Chorus is an unusually well-equipped and balanced body. The tone is fresh; the trebles made no bones about the high notes; tenors were, perhaps, the pick, being ample in numbers and of first-rate quality; the basses lack weight, and are too baritony. Here is an outstanding choir in the making. Choral critics look forward to hearing these singers in some standard work that will give them more sustained opportunities than they had on this occasion, especially in a cappella singing. They must learn to do more with their words. The Schubert items were the engaging early Symphony in B flat, No. 5 (which Prof. Bantock hustled), and Liszt's orchestral version of the 'Reiter-Marsch.' H. G.

BACH CANTATA CLUB

It may be doubted if the Club has ever done anything better than its performance of the B minor Mass with a chorus of thirty-six and an orchestra of twenty-one (St. Margaret's, Westminster, December 4).

Proportion is everything; the ear soon accustomed itself to the small body, and thereafter the essential rightness of the force was indisputable. The lines of the music were clear; the instrumental parts were heard—some of them for the first time in detail; and the solos gained greatly by the new scale of values. When the work is sung by a huge choir, the solos sound almost puny beside the weight of choral tone; at this St. Margaret's performance there was no such violent drop. This way is right, then; but only when an exceptional choir is available. A small force cannot sing the Mass and carry passengers as well. But it is good that as many singers as possible should be on inside terms with the work, so the big choir plan needs no defence. Once in a way, however, we should hear it sung by a body of the size Bach was accustomed to. It is no argument to say that it was never sung in his day. The task was not beyond the singers who tackled a host of other choral works by Bach; the strain is mainly physical, and that was a tough and enduring age.

The soloists at St. Margaret's were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Arthur Cranmer. In the absence of Mr. Kennedy Scott (ill), Sir Hugh Allen conducted. The church was packed. H. G.

BRITISH WOMEN'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

We may now say that the ladies of the orchestra have graduated, or come out. For years they have striven to rise above the level of estimable mediocrity and to get beyond the range of the praise that patronizes, and at last they seem to have succeeded. Proof—if a single instance be proof—was given at Queen's Hall on November 27 in a programme that began with the third 'Leonora' Overture. One listened wholly receptive to the greatness of the music, giving both ears to the composer instead of detaching one for the hazards of performance, and that can happen only in the presence of competent playing. After this the ladies became really daring, and tackled the third Symphony by Sibelius. Thus the concert was made into an event, a summons to the curious to come and listen to a strange and interesting work.

As a satisfaction of curiosity the playing of the Symphony served its purpose as completely as if an orchestra of male experts were at work, and Dr. Malcolm Sargent served all the musical purposes for which famous foreign conductors are engaged.

The occasion may be said to have ranked among the half-dozen important affairs of the season. But the curious stayed away, probably because they had formed the habit in connection with women's orchestras. Such habits take a lot of breaking down, and it is little likely that the prospects of the next concert of the British Women's Symphony Orchestra will be affected by the statements made in this notice. The present writer would have remained sceptical had he not been present at the concert. M.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

This choir, once the uncle and the aunt of choral societies, is now of an age with its conductor, Dr. Malcolm Sargent. It sings with life, good form, and a springy gait, and its performances this season have been talked about. The first was a spirited 'Elijah,' which stood for comparison with Beecham's 'The Messiah,' and differed from it in that the freshness came from within and had nothing in it that sounded artificial. On November 24 the Society sang Dame Ethel Smyth's Mass, in the presence of Her Majesty The Queen, with the composer conducting in her Doctor's robes; and a large audience found that they were thoroughly enjoying both the music and the performance. A few years ago it was considered that the Mass owed its revival to the composer's own vigorous personality and to the chivalry of committees. That view can hardly be held now in view of the good opinions which the music invariably draws from the public and the critics. It is clear that the work is winning its way by its own power. The solo singers were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Parry Jones, and Mr. Stuart Robertson. Miss Hatchard was the soprano soloist in 'The Song of Miriam,' which was conducted by Dr. Sargent.

SOME SINGERS OF THE MONTH

We heard two performances of 'Die schöne Müllerin'—by Mr. Mark Raphael at Wigmore Hall and by Mr. Reinhold Gerhardt at Æolian Hall. The latter had the advantage of bigger voice. His expression was the more intense and his enunciation was perfect. But Mr. Raphael's was the more flexible and varied performance. The miller's changing moods were presented with proper light and shade, whereas Mr. Gerhardt's miller was evidently doomed from the outset. He lost sympathy through being felt to be such a poor-spirited sort of fellow.

Mr. Raphael's technics are improving. Only occasionally did his tone harden. His pianist, Mr. Reeves, was admirable. Mr. Gerhardt must be praised for a feeling for beautiful vowels. His art is in some respects similar to that of his famous sister. He managed much as she does to keep the high notes focussed without any too obvious covering. 'Pause' was especially worth hearing, as he sang it. But he was not always in tune, and he must be censured for his use of aspirates and for his jerky rhythm.

Mr. Brabazon-Lowther sang at Wigmore Hall. His programme included too many finicking songs, considering the nature of the recital-giver's voice—a rough, uncompromising baritone. Mr. Lowther sang French, German, and Italian as though they came easily to him; but thick vowel sounds and heavy accents robbed his Italian of suavity. 'Caro mio ben' was pummelled.

Miss Sarah Fischer, at Wigmore Hall, gave us some welcome singing on French lines. It was not of great weight, but then the programme did not give scope for any largeness of style. Miss Fischer showed a true feeling for fine shades, and her wording was unusually clean. Her low notes were better than her high ones, though faulty breathing spoiled some of her effects.

Miss Violette Browne was above the every-day ruck. Her singing was marked by refinement. Her tones were fresh and free, and she conveyed in her platform manner a sense of ease of poise. One must, however, observe that her higher notes were apt to thin under pressure, especially above F sharp. She adopted a method of direct attack, and in consequence her voice lacked at such moments a true soaring quality. Mr. Arnold Bax contributed a beautiful new song to the programme—'My girdle I hung on a tree-top tall.'

Mr. Leonard Sickert sang at Æolian Hall. Within a small compass his voice made a sweet and artistic effect; but lacking volume and range, it was not suitable for a public performance. H. J. K.

MAY HARRISON

Miss May Harrison has been lamentably shy of public appearances of late years, and her beautiful playing of Bach at the Leeds Festival served to inform us of the measure of our loss. She did, however, give a recital at Wigmore Hall on November 23, and though her programme contained mostly highly-coloured modern works and jeux d'esprit, her classical style of playing (so clean in execution, so clear in intellectual grasp) was a source of strength to the more wayward elements in Bax's emotional Sonata in E and Delius's somewhat diffuse Sonata in C. Mr. Bax himself was her partner in these two Sonatas; Mr. George Reeves played for her in Tartini's 'Devil's Trill' and in a set of more than usually spicy bon-bons. F. H.

HAROLD BROOKE CHOIR

The Harold Brooke Choir gave its Christmas concert at Bishopsgate Institute on December 12. Its programmes can always be depended upon for something fresh and out-of-the-way. Many choirs are likely to follow its lead in reviving Grieg's 'Four Psalms' (unaccompanied, with baritone solos). This music is charming in its quasi-rustic and yet sincerely devotional way. The soloists were Mr. A. H. Perren, Mr. C. I. Record, Mr. J. E. Talbot, and Mr. H. O. Capell. Mr. William Primrose was the violinist, and Miss Maude Allright the pianist in Sir Walford Davies's rattling 'Three Jovial Huntsmen,' a piece of writing which shows how a musician can still make pleasure for all and sundry, yet remain good.

Brahms's anthem, 'O rend the Heavens' (Op. 74, No. 2), was off the beaten track. Only the singing of Bach's 'Be not afraid' betrayed insufficient rehearsing. The tenors must be blamed for a serious wrong entry. Mr. Brooke's sopranos are good, but they should be very careful to guard against shrillness in fortissimo when singing in so over-resonant a hall. Mr. Harry Isaacs played the pianoforte for Mr. Primrose's solos. C.

MUSIC IN SCOTLAND, IRELAND, MANCHESTER, ETC.

Owing to the delay of a packet in the post, we are unable to print our notes of music in Scotland, Ireland, Holland, Manchester and other provincial centres, the London suburbs, and of several London concerts.

STRAUSS'S 'DIE TAGESZEITEN'

FIRST PERFORMANCE IN ENGLAND

One does not often travel to Huddersfield to hear the first English performance of the latest work of one of the most eminent European composers. That it became expedient to do so on November 24 is due to the commendable enterprise of Mr. Irving Silverwood, who secured for the Holme Valley Male-Voice Choir the first performance of Richard Strauss's 'Die Tageszeiten,' a work which he composed for the Schubert celebrations at Vienna, and which was first given there as recently as last July. It is also on his initiative that Mrs. Rosa Newmarch provided an excellent English rendering of Eichendorff's four poems.

It is, however, unfortunate that no better English title could be invented than 'The Times of Day.' In German, of course, as a pendant to 'Die Jahreszeiten' (the seasons) it is much more feasible. The four 'times' are Morning, Noonday, Evening, and Night. The work opens with an unaccompanied chorus which, before it has gone very far, takes one of those little twists with which Strauss so often reminds us of Schubert's modulations. Soon the orchestra breaks in with an effect that seems discordant, but only until the ear has recovered from its surprise. The rest of the movement is vivaciously effective, with no more than a touch of the familiar Teutonic nature sentiment.

Then comes the 'Mid-Day Rest,' in which first a solo violin preludes to a warm-hued reverie. Strauss has always been successful with moods of this type. There are noteworthy examples among his songs; and whatever one may say of some other recent works of his, in this he has lost none of his cunning. Had this been followed by another lively movement all would have been well. But 'Evening' brought more dreams of 'things our hearts had never guessed,' more sustained notes, pedals, long-held chords, and these mostly in the lower register. And 'Night' began, 'How sweet to lie dreaming all night till morning primè,' so that we had yet more of a mood which was the same only more so, the addition being mainly amorous. It was all very luscious and mostly beautiful. Strauss made sure of that. But three successive movements of this kind are at least one too many. The poet should have spent the evening in true Viennese manner—as we understand Schubert often did. Then the Nocturne would have been assured of its welcome, even though it proved the longest of the four sections. As things stood, the undeniable richness of the texture ended by becoming darkly monotonous, just as sometimes a beautiful voice palls because its beauty does not vary sufficiently. And those sustained harmonies became an obsession when they eventually passed to the choir. With such long notes the syllables lose their individual character, and with it their poetical meaning. At that stage the choir might just as well vocalise on an open vowel for all the meaning that penetrates through the orchestra. The latter, of course, has much to do, and there is a fairly extended Prelude to the last poem. Some forty members of the Hallé Orchestra, including its leader, Mr. Alfred Barker, were associated with the choir. It was an ambitious effort, but a few more strings would have made a great deal of difference, both in this and in other works performed the same evening.

Of these one was new—Cyril Jenkins's setting of Masefield's ballad, 'The Yarn of the Loch Achray,' also for chorus and orchestra. This, naturally, is square-cut music. With a nautical ballad it could scarcely be otherwise. But it is effective, and certainly not the less so that a greater proportion than usual of the words come through intelligibly. I attribute this to the device of a simple opening by which the ear gets so attuned that later it may seize the meaning, though the parts be more complicated. The orchestra comments upon them, not too literally, making some good points, and working up to some effective climaxes.

Coming, as it did, at the end of the programme, the ballad provided the right type of conclusion, besides furnishing a complete contrast to what had gone before. This included Holst's four 'Rig Veda' hymns and his early setting of Walt Whitman's 'A Dirge for Two Veterans,' and Brahms's Rhapsody with, for soloist, Miss Olga Haley, who also sang very attractively a number of songs with Mrs. Edward Haley at the pianoforte.

'DER FREISCHÜTZ' AT OXFORD

The Oxford University Opera Club, after the ardours of reviving for an ungrateful public early examples of opera by Monteverde, sought rest and reimbursement in Weber's romantic opera 'Der Freischütz.' Now it may be argued with justice that 'Der Freischütz' needs singers of the first class and more than usually careful production. The O.U.O.C., however, might excuse the rashness of its choice by pointing to the previous successful production by a joint town-and-gown company under Sir Hugh Allen, in 1911. Weber probably would not have been content to turn a party of undergraduates loose in the Wolf's Glen, for the 20th-century Oxonian will not cower before a diminished seventh and a wind machine; on the contrary, he will be moved to all sorts of light-hearted frivolity with electric torches and toy cinematographs. And academic Oxford in the stalls was moved by all these stage horrors to ripples of happy laughter. Nor had Oxford a Lotte Lehmann for 'Softly sighing,' nor a Richard Mayr for 'Then till I'm beneath the sod.' But if amateurs do not produce these rarely-heard (in England) and quite delightful operas, we may wait for them in vain—not even the Weber centenary moved Covent Garden.

If, then, the performance on the first night was not a very finished one, it was a pleasant reminder to those who had witnessed or taken part in the earlier production; it was a revelation to the others of the quality of Weber's genius. It gave a chance to many promising singers in the small parts—the Killian of Mr. J. W. Kentish (Oriel) was a delightful sketch; the Cuno of Mr. P. J. Clapham (New College) was a good study in a 'heavy' part; the hermit of Mr. A. V. Corry (Merton) was a little too decrepit to show us the true quality of his good bass voice (the hermit need not be old, all that is required is hairiness and a weather-beaten air). Zamiel needs no voice, but ability to use a black cloak impressively—Mr. J. R. M. Senior was a nimble demon; the six bridesmaids, passable soloists, were a delightful sextet in their silly little bit of very adorable tune.

The principals were Mr. Sumner Austin (St. John's) as Rodolph, who obligingly became a tenor for the week and showed himself nearly, but not quite, as much at home as a hero as in the more mundane parts of his ordinary baritone life. Mr. Grisewood (Magdalen) has the voice for the villain, but was not always as crisp in his singing (e.g., in the drinking-song already mentioned) as he ought to have been. Mrs. Bertha Phillips combines experience as a singer and an actress, and though she hardly gave us the full flavour of Agnes's music, she bore her half-share of the weight of the opera very competently. Miss Susan Turner brought charm and whimsical humour to the part of Annie, and though her voice is small, she sang prettily and in such a way as to make it tell in the ensembles. The orchestra on the first night was hesitating and below standard, but it picked up during subsequent performances under Mr. Reginald Jacques's skilful guidance. Orchestral playing at Oxford is at the moment, and has been for some little while, in a somewhat depressed condition, like its rowing, but this at least can be said for the orchestra in 'Der Freischütz,' that it relied very little on professional help.

No expense was incurred in the staging, and apart from the excitements of the Wolf's Glen, we had to be content with scenery of the Covent Garden realistic type.

Music in the Provinces

BARNSLEY.—The St. Cecilia Society gave 'A Tale of Old Japan' and the 'Unfinished' Symphony on December 6, under Dr. J. Frederic Staton.

BARNSTAPLE.—A Schubert Concert was given by the Musical Festival Society at the Parish Church on December 4 under the direction of Mr. Sydney Harper and Mr. Percy Parish. The principal works were 'Great is Jehovah,' 'The Song of Miriam,' and the 'Unfinished' Symphony.

BATH.—Among the works recently given at the Pump Room Concerts under Mr. Jan Hurst have been Spohr's twelfth Violin Concerto, played by Mr. Edwin Kierton, Weber's Clarinet Concerto, played by Mr. Thomas Pearson, Goldmark's 'Rustic Wedding' Symphony, Debussy's 'Children's Corner,' Holst's 'Fugal Concerto,' Mouton's Suite 'Fables de la Fontaine,' and the 'Eroica' Symphony.

BEDFORD.—A miscellaneous programme given by the Bedford Orpheus Choir on November 29 included Elgar's 'Weary Wind of the West,' Pearsall's 'Great God of Love,' Parry's 'He thrilled me once,' Geoffrey Shaw's 'He who would true valour see' and Bach's 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring.'

BIRMINGHAM.—Three Schubert performances were given by the City Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Adrian Boult. The Symphony in C was played at the West End Cinema on November 18 and at a lunch-hour concert in the Town Hall three days later, and the 'Unfinished' was played to an audience of children on November 24. Other works in the City Orchestra programmes have been Borodin's second Symphony, Frank Bridge's 'The Sea,' Smyth's 'The Wreckers' Overture, two movements from a Symphony by Oliver H. Gotch, Elgar's 'Cello Concerto, played by Mr. Harry Stanier, and a Symphony in D by Philip Emmanuel Bach.——Holst's 'Dirge for two Veterans' was performed at the Town Hall on November 15 by the Police Orchestra and Choir, under Mr. Richard Wassell, who also conducted Verdi's 'Joan of Arc' Overture. ——The Schubert Centenary has been observed by various chamber music organizations with performances of the 'Trout' Quintet, the 'Death and the Maiden' Quartet, the Quartet-Satz, and the String Quintet.

BLACKBURN.—A new series of chamber concerts under the direction of Mr. E. Romaine O'Malley opened on November 19 with performances of Fauré's Quartet, Op. 15, and Brahms's Op. 26.

BLYTON.—The chief item in the Choral Society's programme, on November 30, was Bach's 'Christ, our Helper.' This and a selection of part-songs were well sung under the direction of Mr. E. T. Letts.

BOLTON.—The first concert, or 'open rehearsal,' of the Bolton Orchestral Society drew a crowded audience to hear the 'Freischütz' Overture, the first movement from the 'New World' Symphony, and Mr. Frank Mullings. Mr. Archie Camden conducted.

BOURNEMOUTH.—At the first concert of the Municipal Choir 'The Music-Makers' and 'A Tale of Old Japan' were sung under the direction of Sir Dan Godfrey, the choir having been trained by Mr. Hadley Watkins.——Sir Thomas Beecham conducted the Orchestra, on December 1, in Delius's 'On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring' and 'A Summer Night on the River,' and in Lord Berners's 'Mock Fugue.'

BRADFORD.—Dr. Malcolm Sargent conducted the Festival Choral Society on November 16 in Holst's 'Hymns from the Rig Veda,' Boughton's 'Barkshire Tragedy,' and 'King Arthur,' and the first set of Brahms's 'Liebeslieder.'——Eric Fogg's 'Hillside' (a setting of Rabindranath Tagore) and Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter' were performed by the Bradford Old Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Wilfrid Knight, on November 21. The soloists were Miss Garda Hall and Mr. Harold Williams.——A programme given by the Hallé Orchestra, under Sir Hamilton Harty, on November 23, included Haydn's 'Sinfonie Concertante,' Chopin's second Pianoforte Concerto, played by Orloff, and a selection from Berlioz's 'Romeo and Juliet.'

BRIGHTON.—The Harmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Taylor, gave an excellent performance of 'Elijah' on November 24.

BRISTOL.—The Philharmonic Society opened its season on November 17 with Schubert's Symphony in C and Vaughan Williams's 'Sea' Symphony, in which the solo parts were taken by Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Keith Falkner. The Catterall Quartet was at the Victoria Rooms on November 25 with a programme of Ravel, Schumann (in F), and Mozart (G minor).——On December 4 the Léner Quartet concluded its series of chamber concerts with a French programme.

CALVERLEY.—A concert version of 'Faust' was given on November 26 by the Choral Society, under its new director, Mr. Clifford W. Towlson, with the assistance of a string orchestra.

CAMBRIDGE.—A notice of the new ballet 'Primavera' will be found on p. 68.——The Leys School Music Society gave a Bach programme, including 'Jesus called to Him the Twelve' and 'Ich habe genug,' under the direction of Mr. T. F. Bye, on Sunday, December 2.——The Léner Quartet was at the Guildhall on December 5.

CHICHESTER.—Two concerts were given on December 4 by the Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. E. J. W. Crowe. The afternoon programme included Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite, and madrigals sung by a choir of Bishop Otter College students. In the evening the Apollo Male-Voice Choir assisted, under Mr. W. Lumley.——The concert given by the Chichester Musical Society, on December 11, under Dr. Conway, was a farewell, for the Society is to be disbanded, after about fifty years of existence, for want of male singers.

COLCHESTER.—'King Olaf' was given by the Colchester and District Musical Society, under Mr. W. F. Kingdon, on December 11. The choir and orchestra numbered a hundred and sixty performers.

COVENTRY.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. John C. Potter, gave a performance of 'Elijah' on December 5.——At a recital on December 6, Mr. William Primrose and Dr. Harold Rhodes played Franck's Violin Sonata.

DARLASTON.—The new abridged version of 'Semele' was given by the Choral Society on November 26. Mr. E. B. Morgan conducted, and the four principals were Miss Emily Broughton, Miss Emmie Northall, Mr. Charles F. Jones, and Mr. Joseph Yates.

DEVIZES.—The Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. F. V. Weaver, performed 'The Hymn of Praise,' Parry's 'There is an old belief,' Vaughan Williams's 'Bushes and Briars,' and Dyson's 'Evening,' on November 21.

EXETER.—Mr. T. Armstrong, the new organist of the Cathedral, made his first appearance as conductor of the Oratorio Society at the Annual Concert on December 5. The music included 'Acis and Galatea,' with Miss Mabel Ritchie, Mr. Edward Leer, and Mr. Frederick Taylor as principals, and Elgar's second 'Wand of Youth' Suite. On the following evening this Society performed 'The Song of Hiawatha' under Mr. Armstrong, with the same soloists.——The Exeter String Orchestra, under Mr. A. J. James, played Elgar's Introduction and Allegro at its nineteenth concert. ——The Chamber Music Club gave a Schubert Concert on November 23; on December 12 the programme included Swan Hennessy's 'Rapsodie Celtique,' for violin and pianoforte, and Purcell Warren's 'Air and Variations' for string quartet.

FALMOUTH.—After a concert by the Music Club, on December 1, the Opera Singers gave a performance of Vaughan Williams's 'The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains,' with orchestral accompaniment.

Folkestone.—At the Philharmonic Society's concert, on November 28, the choir, assisted by the Municipal Orchestra, gave a concert performance of 'Faust,' under the direction of Mr. E. E. Fletcher.——Mozart's thirty-fifth Symphony and the 'Boutique Fantasque' Suite were played by the orchestra on November 29.

Gloucester.—The new Chamber Music Society brought into being by Mr. H. W. Sumsion has nearly five hundred members. On December 7, the Society met to hear the Brosa Quartet.——The newly formed Bach Cantata Club, conducted by Mr. Sumsion, gave 'Sleepers, wake' in the Cathedral, on December 7.

Grimsby.—Mr. Percy Wilson conducted the Grimsby Choral Society in its performance of 'The Song of Hiawatha,' on November 27. The solo parts were taken by Miss Mary Hamlin, Mr. Leonard Gowing, and Mr. Howard Fry.——The Orchestral Society played three suites under Dr. J. Williamson, on November 30—Parry's 'Lady Radnor,' Holst's 'St. Paul's,' and a Suite for String Orchestra by W. H. Reed.

Guildford.—McEwen's 'Jocund Dance' was played by the string section of the Guildford Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Claud Powell, on November 20.

Halifax.—The fine qualities of the Halifax Choral Society were displayed in a performance of 'The Damnation of Faust,' under the direction of Dr. A. C. Tysoe. The solo parts were sung by Miss Bella Baillie, Mr. Walter Widdop, and Mr. Harold Williams, and the Leeds Orchestra assisted.

Hanley.—The Stoke-on-Trent Choral Society gave 'The Messiah' at Hanley, on December 6, under Sir Henry Wood.

The Hartlepools.—At a concert given by the Hartlepools Symphony Orchestra, on November 28, Mr. Sydney Errington played a Rhapsody for Viola and Orchestra by W. H. Reed. Mr. J. F. Chalmers Park conducted.

Hastings.—The recent Festival is described on p. 68. During a week in December, six violinists of the orchestra appeared as soloists at the Municipal Concerts, under Mr. Cameron.

Hereford.—The Choral Society, under Dr. Percy Hull, gave 'Caractacus' on November 27, with Miss Joan Elwes, Mr. Trefor Jones, and Mr. Percy Underwood as principals.

Huddersfield.—At the concert given by the Holme Valley Male-Voice Choir, under Mr. Silverwood, on November 24, Strauss's 'Die Tageszeiten' was performed for the first time in England. A special notice is printed on p. 72.

Hull.—At the City Hotel, on November 17, the Hull Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. E. T. Sales, sang Schubert's 'The Song of the Spirits over the Waters' and Elgar's 'The Herald.'——Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetic' Symphony was played under Sir Henry Wood at a concert of the Hull Philharmonic Society.

Ipswich.—Beethoven's fifth Symphony was the principal feature of the programme given by the Orchestral Society at the Public Hall, on December 5, under the direction of Mr. Edgar Wilby.

Kidderminster.—The programme of the Choral Society's concert under Mr. J. Irving Glover, on November 28, included 'The Black Knight' and the 'Unfinished' Symphony.

Kings Lynn.—'Acis and Galatea' was given by the Musical Society on December 6, under Mr. Alfred Heath. The soprano and bass parts were sung by two local amateurs, Miss Olive Foreman and Mr. C. J. Otterspoor.

Leeds.—The new abridged version of 'Semele' was given by the Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Bairstow, on November 28. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra assisted, and the principals were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Miss Lottie Beaumont, Mr. Arthur Jordan.——The Symphony Society gave a concert on November 24 in co-operation with the Leeds Schools of Music and Drama League, the chief items being the Handel-Elgar Overture and Mozart's Violin Concerto in D, played by Mr. Percy Frostick.——Mr. Julius Harrison conducted the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, on December 1, in a Saint-Saëns Violin Concerto (played by Miss Isolde Menges), Keith Douglas's 'Overture to a Comedy,' and his own 'Prelude Music' for harp and strings.——The Leeds Bohemian Concerts were revived on December 5 with a concert at which Mr. Laurance Turner's Quartet played Haydn, Beethoven, and Dvorák.

Leek.—'The Song of Hiawatha' was given at the Grand Theatre, on December 4, by the Choral Society, under Mr. D. R. Conway.

Leicester.—The Philharmonic Society's programme, on November 21, consisted of the 'Choral' Symphony and selections from the third Act of 'The Mastersingers.' Dr. H. W. Rhodes was the chorus-master, and Sir Henry Wood conducted.

Lincoln.—At the concert of the Lincoln Musical Society, on November 29, Dr. G. J. Bennett conducted a performance of Handel's 'Alexander's Feast.' This bright and dramatic work, as sung at Lincoln, more than justifies its revival. The soloists were Miss Bella Baillie, Mr. Heddle Nash, and Mr. Stuart Robertson. The programme included a new work 'In honour of the City,' by Dr. George Dyson, for chorus and orchestra. This was the first performance, and was conducted by the composer. It proved a work of great interest, both to choir and orchestra, and was extremely well received. The choral singing was of an exceptionally high standard throughout. The orchestra, mainly Hallé, also played under Dr. Bennett the Andante and Finale from Schubert's C major Symphony; the other movements of this Symphony were heard in Lincoln Cathedral earlier in the year.

Liverpool.—At the Philharmonic Society's concert, on November 20, Sir Hamilton Harty conducted Brahms's second Symphony, Saint-Saëns's second Pianoforte Concerto (played by Mr. Levitzki), and the Suite from Strauss's 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.'——A Wagner programme was given under Sir Henry Wood, on December 4.——A concert of special interest was given by the International String Quartet at a meeting of the B.M.S., on November 15. The works played were Bernard van Dieren's sixth Quartet, Herbert Howells's Clarinet Quintet, Prokofiev's Sextet known as 'An Overture on Yiddish Themes,' and Charles Wood's 'Variations on an Irish Theme.' The extra players were Mr. W. R. Clarke (clarinet) and Mr. John Tobin (pianoforte).——Schubert's Octet was played at the Rodewald concert on November 19.

Luton.—'The Burden of Babylon,' the new work by Granville Bantock that was produced at the recent Three Choirs Festival, was given its second performance by the Luton Choral Society on December 6, under the composer's direction.

Lytham.—Mr. S. H. Broughton conducted the Lytham Vocal Society in 'Judas Maccabæus' on December 5, the principal parts being taken by Miss Marie Trenbath, Mr. Wilfrid Hindle, and Mr. Norris Parker.

Maidstone.—The Schubert programme given by the Choral Union, on November 27, under the direction of Mr. F. Wilson Parish, included 'God in the Thunderstorm' and a number of other choral pieces. Songs were given by Mr. Cecil Cope, and pianoforte works by Mr. Adolph Hallis; and movements from various string quartets were also played.

Marlborough.—The Choral Society gave 'The Messiah' at the Town Hall on December 3, under the direction of Mr. Francis J. Hill. The choir and orchestra numbered a hundred and twenty performers.

Norwich.—'The Song of Hiawatha' was performed on November 19 at the Municipal concert, under the direction of Mr. Maddern Williams, Miss Garda Hall, Mr. John Turner, and Mr. Howard Fry taking the principal parts.——The programme given by the Norwich Chamber Orchestra, under Mr. Cyril Pearce, on November 22, included Purcell's Incidental Music to 'The Married Beau,' for string orchestra, Bach's second 'Brandenburg' Concerto, Holst's Fugal

Concerto, with Mr. E. H. Seely and Mr. W. Milner as soloists, Warlock's Serenade for string orchestra, and Grainger's 'Mock Morris.'

NOTTINGHAM.—On November 21, Mr. Allen Gill conducted the Harmonic Society in 'Acis and Galatea,' 'The Song of Destiny,' and 'The Song of Miriam.'

OXFORD.—A special notice of 'Der Freischütz' is given on p. 72. Other events of importance have been as follows: 'The Creation,' by St. Aldate's Choral Society, under Mr. Crawford McNair; George Dyson's new choral work 'In Honour of the City,' given by the Harmonic Society, under Mr. Jacques, with pianoforte accompaniment; a Schubert concert for school children by the Oxford Orchestral Society, under Mr. Guy Warrack; a Sammons-Hambourg-Dawson concert; concerts by the McCullagh and Léner Quartets; recitals by Mr. Gordon Woodhouse and Mr. Nikolai Nadejin; an afternoon concert on December 6, at which the Orchestral Society played the 'New World' Symphony; and a Cortot-Thibaud-Casals concert on the same evening.

Music in Wales

ABERYSTWYTH.—The last College concert of the session was devoted to the first four parts of the 'Christmas Oratorio' given by the united forces of the Choral and Orchestral Union under Prof. de Lloyd, the soloists being the Misses Katie Griffiths, Myfanwy Ellis, and Enid Roberts, and Messrs. T. Pickering and W. R. Allen.

CARDIFF.—On November 18, Mr. Hubert Ware's Orchestra gave a Schubert Centenary concert at which the chief items were the 'Unfinished' Symphony and the Overture to 'Rosamunde.' The blind pianist Mr. Alec Templeton played the Impromptu in B flat and one or two other small items, and Miss Gwladys Naish sang 'In Springtime' and 'Hymn to the Almighty.'——On December 2, Miss Florence Austral gave a recital of which two of the principal features were Brünnhilde's 'Battle Cry' and 'Ocean, thou mighty monster.' Mr. John Amadio (flute) played Bach's Sonata No. 4, Debussy's 'Flute of Pan,' and the Finale from Mozart's Concerto in D.——On December 9, the Cardiff Musical Society, assisted by the National Orchestra of Wales, gave a performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion, the principals being the Misses Dorothy Bennett and Astra Desmond, and Messrs. T. Pickering, Ronald Chivers, and George Parker. Mr. Warwick Braithwaite conducted.——The free concerts in the National Museum of Wales have covered a wide field, including Overtures and Symphonies by Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Dvorák, Saint-Saëns, Glazounov, and Elgar, with many selections from Wagner and representatives of the Russian school.——The Thursday Subscription concerts by the National Orchestra of Wales in the Cardiff City Hall included a Schubert Centenary concert on November 22, when the great Symphony in C was given.——Other concerts have included Gluck's Overture to 'Iphigenia in Aulis,' Bach's Concerto for two pianofortes, Debussy's incidental music to 'L'Enfant Prodigue,' and Scriabin's Symphony No. 3, and 'The Divine Poem,' while the Saturday Popular concerts have given a large number of light selections of a miscellaneous order.——Recitals have been given by Chaliapin and Florence Austral.

NEWPORT.—On November 13, the Newport Choral Society, assisted by the National Orchestra of Wales, gave Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and 'The Death of Minnehaha,' conducted by Mr. A. E. Sims. The performance is described as a good one, but to have been somewhat lacking in romance in some of the linked-up choruses. The soloists were Miss Miriam Licette, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Harold Williams. Before the choral work Mr. Warwick Braithwaite conducted a performance of the same composer's Ballade in A minor.

NEW SILOH.—'The Song of Miriam' was sung in Welsh at a Schubert Centenary concert given on December 4, under Mr. H. Treharne Thomas.

SWANSEA.—The 'Unfinished' Symphony was played by the Swansea and District Symphony Orchestra Society, under Mr. Horace Samuel, on November 17, and a group of Schubert's songs was sung by Mr. Roy Henderson.——Schubert's Mass in A was given by the Catholic Choral Society under Mr. Ceredig Williams, on December 2.

ITALY

Since our last notes were written the season of the Ufficio Concerti has been successfully inaugurated, and, to the time of sending copy to press, the most interesting evenings have been those of the pianists Baron Anatole Vietinghoff Scheel and Mischa Levitzky, and the violinist Albert Spalding. The Baron gave an all-Russian programme which proved very interesting indeed, the only jarring note being a set of variations by Glazounov. Some of the treatments were inspired and musicianly, but others descended to mere vulgarity.

Of the concerts of the Ente Orchestrale of La Scala, first mention must be made of the programme dedicated to Schubert. Among a lot of lesser-known music was given the 'Unfinished.' Toscanini conducted, and added to the general admiration of his versatility. The Belgian Désiré Defauw was a 'guest-conductor,' and pleased the most fastidious ear with his reading of Franck.

One of the most meritorious revivals, or perhaps it would be more correct to say introductions to Milan, was that of 'La Finta Giardiniera,' the eighteen-year-old Mozart's charming little opera. I believe it was given here some time after it was written in 1775, but have no certain knowledge on this point. It was produced at the Da Verme and, one is happy to add, succeeded in drawing some of the best houses of the season. The production was not, unfortunately, of a standard compatible with the music, and though stage settings and the action were of a high order, it was apparent that the company had not rehearsed sufficiently. There is a strong unity of theme throughout the work which supersedes its contemporaries of the third Neapolitan period. From the Mozart of 'Bastien,' through 'La Finta Giardiniera,' one arrives at 'Die Entführung,' and the forest scene clearly foreshadows 'Figaro.' This opera closed the autumn season at the Dal Verme.

We are at present enjoying the operas at La Scala. There is no need to comment at length, as last year special mention was made of the opera, and this year's interpreters have been the same, but for a new Desdemona, Rosetta Pampanini, who sang very beautifully, but has not yet the dignity and style necessary to sustain this part in perfection. I am told by Madame Teresa Arkel, who was one of the greatest dramatic sopranos of last century (she appeared for the last time in public at La Scala in 1899) and who was a close friend of Verdi's, that the 'Ave Maria' of the third Act was never intended to be sung. The idea was partly to declaim, partly to murmur, and partly to intone the lines, here and there raising the tone on a couple of words exactly in the manner that one might expect to hear in church.

Another Verdi opera followed, 'La Forza del Destino,' and was a great success. Both Bianca Scacciati and the tenor Merli sang beautifully. There was always a feeling of security, and perfect command of colour and phrasing. Rather less effective was the baritone Franci. He has an immense voice and a fine personality, but the subtleties of the rôle escaped him. Had he and Stabile changed rôles, the improvement would have been striking. For both of these operas Toscanini conducted, and brought out all the inherent beauties of the scores.

The Wolf-Ferrari opera of last year, 'Sly,' was again greeted with cordiality. In the rôle of Sly, Pertile was well suited, his fine acting and perfect vocalisation winning him an ovation. 'Sly' will undoubtedly become very popular. It was well received at its German première a few weeks ago.

The first of the novelties was given on November 22 in the shape of Michetti's 'La Maddelena.' The composer was his own librettist, and to my mind he was equally a failure in both rôles. The story revolves about John the Baptist and Mary Magdalen—a subject that could have provided a good libretto and dramatic action. But all the old 'gags' are employed—the opening banquet and accompanying scene of orgy, the 'voice that is heard,' &c.—to the complete destruction of the interest that may possibly have been felt in the libretto. This opera in another dress was first produced some years ago at Rome, where it shared the same fate as on this occasion. It was then called 'Maria Magdalena,' but the altered libretto and setting have not made a new opera of it. The singers, Lina Bruna Rasa, Melandre, and Borgioli, did their best to put something into the music that was not there, but despite their valiant and praiseworthy work, the production was a failure.

The Pizzetti music-drama 'Fra Gherardo,' which was so well received last year, again had an undoubted success. The interpreters were the same as before, and all showed that greater intimacy that comes to good artists with the passing of time. Toscanini conducted, and made the most of the magnificent score. In the title-rôle Trantoul is well placed; the dark middle of his voice is suited to the long recitatives that lie more in the baritone tessitura than in the tenor; and in the part of Mariana, Cristoforeanù sang with conviction. 'La Tosca' was given on December 6 under Santini, with an exceptionally good caste. Scacciati's 'Vissi d'arte' was one of the best I remember, and her acting equally good. Cavaradossi as done by Pertile needs little eulogy. That polished singer and finished actor could only with difficulty be excelled to-day.

With the end of 1928 Toscanini completed his thirtieth year as conductor of our greatest theatre. On the occasion of 1898, he conducted 'The Mastersingers,' and naturally the same opera will be given to celebrate the anniversary. We are also promised an entirely new edition of 'Parsifal.' New scenery has already been prepared, and should surpass every other set in existence. The roster of the theatre announces several absolute novelties for Milan, the world-premières of some other operas, and the first performances at La Scala of four old operas.

CHARLES D'IF.

VIENNA

THE STAATSOPER

The figurehead of the present season is Wilhelm Furtwängler. The advent of the new Doctor honoris causâ gave a new stimulus to the orchestral activity of the city, and—what is more surprising—to the operatic as well. His long-negotiated engagement for the Staatsoper was greeted with mingled feelings. There was no doubt of his powers, but considerable doubt as to how long and how thoroughly he would exercise them. The Staatsoper needed a strong hand, a new mind—a musician willing to devote his entire time and energy to the house and its artists. Furtwängler had been a nomad. Was he the proper man for a stationary job?

Time seemed to have given the answer, at least for the present. Furtwängler did not come to conduct a performance or two between express trains. He stayed and laboured for weeks, and his first Vienna production, a revival of 'Rheingold,' surpassed all hopes. His impetus, his fanatic passion for work, seemed to have brought a new life into the peaceful precincts of our Staatsoper. All the artists and all the staff had been kindled by the fire of his personality—most of all Dr. Lothar Wallerstein, the stage director, and Alfred Roller, the scenic designer, who brought scenic innovations so bold as to give joy to the modernist, yet so unobtrusively applied and so perfectly carried out as not to offend the perfect Bayreuthite. Richard Wagner's dream of the 'immaterialised' theatre was fulfilled, with the resources and spirit of the 20th century yet with the catholicity of the strictest Wagnerian creed. The Rhine-Maidens' music was sung by singers off-stage, their parts being acted by young dancers; unhampered by attention to vocal requirements, they revel in a frolicsome play both joyful and suggestive. The poses and lighting effects are devised with as much regard for picturesqueness as for symbolic meaning. Erda appears as a huge vision inseparably connected with the rotating globe. The realm of the Nibelungs, as seen by Dr. Wallerstein, emphasises the social element according to Wagner's intentions: a huge structure not unlike a modern coal-mine, with threatening red light hinting at silent revolt. On the whole, Wallerstein held the praiseworthy middle between the naturalism that Wagner had to rely upon and a modern expressionism and abstraction skilfully and discriminately applied.

The great moving power of the evening, however, was Furtwängler. He governed his orchestra as well as the stage by his supreme will. Marvellous the dynamics of his reading, which shunned explosions and reserved its strength for the great climaxes; wonderful his conducting of the Interludes, which seemed at once a logical continuation of the preceding scene and a connection to the following one; beyond all praise his faithfulness to the Wagnerian score, which yet sounded fresh and novel in every note. Furtwängler received ovations such as Vienna does not even bestow on Richard Strauss. There seemed no doubt as to the general sentiment, that he was the man to fulfil what Richard Strauss had failed to give us: a new golden age of the Vienna Staatsoper. Unfortunately, according to latest reports, these hopes will not materialise. Negotiations with Furtwängler, which seemed so promising, have failed at the last moment, and it is now decided that the greater part of his time will in future be devoted to Berlin, with occasional guest appearances at the Vienna Opera filling merely the spare time of the great conductor. Director Schalk, who answered the negotiations with Furtwängler by a formal renunciation of his post, is likely to be reinstated in greater power and for a longer period than his present contract calls for.

THE ORCHESTRAS

Furtwängler had this season taken the reins of the Philharmonic Orchestra as well, and with firm hands. Here, too, he stepped into the place which some had wished to see reserved for Strauss. With the Staatsoper and Philharmonic united in his hands, and with his present function with the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in addition, Furtwängler would have been the uncrowned king of Vienna's musical life. The first Philharmonic concert of the season was in the nature of things a bow to the genius of Schubert: the 'Unfinished' and the big C major Symphony, both played with a grandeur of conception and purity of style such as only a great conductor and a great orchestra can give.

Robert Heger shared the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde concerts with Furtwängler, and as his portion of the season's work has so far given Walter Braunfels's great Mass, and, as a belated novelty, 'Seven Orchestral Songs' by Alban Berg. Written in 1907, these beautiful lyric specimens reveal the somewhat surprising fact that even Alban Berg once trod in the footsteps of a Richard Strauss; the scoring, of quite recent date, rightly follows the rather conservative idiom of those early songs.

The Konzertverein concerts are again under the baton of Leopold Reichweim, who divides his time between Vienna and his activities as general musical director at Bochum.

The Tonkünstler, whose clientèle has been steadily on the decline since the departure of Furtwängler, resorts this season to a guest-conductor system in the hope of creating new interest among its subscribers. The conductors are not always wisely chosen; interesting German conductors whom Vienna is anxious to hear—Klemperer and Kleiber, for instance, or Bruno Walter — are missing from the list, and several mediocrities take their place.

THE OPERATIC SITUATION

The Volksoper, which fell by the wayside definitely a few months ago, remains closed for the present. Fantastic projects are being considered, among them one sponsored by a gentleman who failed before as director of the Volksoper and who promises again, and no less vaguely, the financial support of his far-famed 'British syndicate.' Notwithstanding such promises, the future of the Volksoper is dark, which is deplorable, since this smaller house would seem destined to an important rôle as a branch theatre of the Staatsoper, or as an 'experimental' supplement thereof. It is all the more so in view of director Schalk's well-known aversion to novelties.

For the current season, the leader of our State Opera has ventured upon no definite promises regarding new works. Rabaud's 'Marouf' is announced, as a visible and audible vote of thanks directed to the French official promoters of the Vienna Opera's recent Paris season, and Ravel's 'L'enfant et les sortilèges' is casually mentioned also in this connection. We also hear of a new ballet by Julius Bittner, 'Der Taugenichts von Wien,' with a widely praised scenario by Grete Wiesenthal, the famous Viennese dancer, and built on a Viennese dance. The staging is to be done by Sascha Leontjeff, the young Russian whose appointment as ballet-master of the Staatsoper was rather abruptly announced after Harald Kreutzberg had declined the job. Leontjeff is a dancer of undeniable emotional force, but of less technical equipment or experience as a choregrapher. Besides Leontjeff, Marie Gutheil-Schoder, the once-famous Strauss singer, has been added to the staff of 'régisseurs,' replacing Waldemar Runge, who has left the Staatsoper. The long-deferred revival of Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis' is to be her first production.

THE END OF VIENNESE OPERETTA?

One significant symptom of Vienna's musical development is what many be rather pathetically alluded to as the 'Passing of Viennese Operetta.' Hubert Marischka's Theater an der Wien, tradition-laden since the days of Johann Strauss, has ceased to exist as a comic-opera house, and Max Reinhardt is now conducting it as a branch theatre of his Theater in der Josefstadt. The Johann Strauss Theater continues its pseudo-operetta life as the home of Franz Lehar's increasingly 'grand' operatic works, and the Carl Theater, another historical operetta house, has been turned into a dramatic theatre.

Perhaps all this means the end of Viennese operetta; if so, no one will complain, save composers like Emerich Kalman, Marischka's house composer (who indeed threatens to go to court). Viennese operetta of the traditional type has long since yielded its supremacy to the revue, and the revue, in turn, is visibly dying for want of new ideas. What the future of European operettas will be is difficult to foretell. Perhaps, indeed probably, American revue-operetta of the Gershwin, Kern, or Youmans type—with or without jazz.

SLAV INVASION

The operatic season began, as customary in recent years, with a Slav invasion. Czecho-Slovakia, bent on 'peaceful penetration,' again sent us a company from the Olmütz Municipal Opera, for the joy and edification of their Viennese co-nationals as well as of the serious music-lover eager for less-known operas. This year the troupe brought a novelty with 'Sarka,' a romantic opera by Fibich. Like most Czech operas, it is built on a plot drawn from national history, and is melodious and singable. Fibich is one of the three or four composers whom the Czech race love dearly. Janacek, their great modern master, is still caviare to the populace, but the rich melodies of Smetana and Dvorák are a treasure that their countrymen are proud of. Fibich does not measure up to his two famous compatriots. He draws less on Czech folk-music and rather more on Wagnerian ideas and principles. The performance of 'Sarka' was excellent, in fact more than that in view of the modest means of a provincial troupe.

Russia, also, sent a musical company to Vienna: Alexis Granowsky's Yiddish Academic State Theatre. The writer, and Vienna in general, did not quite share the enthusiasm which Berlin, bent on innovations and sensations at any cost, bestowed upon this troupe. The 'primitive' stage settings, once the spice and fun of visiting Russian troups, has long been recognised as a virtue born of lack of funds; we have seen too much of such 'parody on stage realism,' and of the well-nigh proverbial versatility of contemporary Russian actor-singer-dancer-acrobats, to be further taken in by that sort of thing. Russian companies will henceforth interest us more by giving plays as they are written, without undue stress laid on non-existing scenery and humorous gymnastic tricks resulting from their absence.

TORONTO

These are prosperous times in Canada, especially at Toronto. Money is everywhere, and is being spent freely—witness nearly a dozen skyscrapers shooting up almost overnight. We are happy to record, also, that much of this money is finding its way into musical circles; yet, unfortunately for the actual music and musician of Canada, it is the visiting artist from across the border who is the final beneficiary. However, the activity is good. Concert managements are rushing virtuosi at the public headlong, throwing caution and much of their own profit to the winds. There are five impresarios and managements hard at work this season—Mr. Norman Withrow, Mr. E. I. Suckling, the Philharmonic Concerts (Miss A. Steels), the Canadian Concert Bureau (Mr. Bernard Preston), and the Richard Wix Concert Management. Add to these the activities of the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir, the Symphony Orchestra, the Hart House String Quartet, and the Women's Musical Club, and you will not be surprised to hear that in our six to seven months' season we are being asked to support well over seventy individual concerts.

We began early in the month with the final week (there were three in all) of the D'Oyly Carte Company's Gilbert and Sullivan presentations. Every performance was packed. There followed in rapid succession Sophie Breslau, perhaps the greatest American lyric contralto; the Salzedo Harp Ensemble (their first appearance); Vladimir Horowitz, a new Russian pianist of great power and charm; the ever-delightful English Singers; Alberto Salvi, harpist; Josef Hoffman; Mischa Elman; Marie Thomson, who gave a most fascinating recital of Hebridean songs; the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in two concerts, with Phyllis Kraeuter, 'cellist, and Margaret Hamilton, pianist; the Hart House String Quartet, who gave fine performances of Franck's D major Quartet and Schubert's A major Quintet; the Five-Pianoforte Ensemble (Norah Drewett, Reginald Stewart, Signor Guerrere, Viggo Kihl, and Ernest Seitz), a clever creation of Dr. Ernest Macmillan's, who conducts five-pianoforte arrangements of the better-known works of Chopin, Liszt, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Bach; Hans Kindler the famous 'cellist of the Philadelphia Symphony; and an unusually interesting Schubert Centenary Concert at the Conservatory, presenting the Octet and the B flat Trio.

PARIS

Stravinsky Festivals are not rare nowadays. Those organized by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris on November 16 and 17 had a special interest; they aimed at giving a view of Stravinsky over a period of nearly twenty-five years. The programmes, apart from the works that have been responsible for Stravinsky's fame, contained the Symphony in E flat, Op. 1, a yet unpublished Study for orchestra, a concert-arrangement of 'Apollon-Musagète,' and two short Suites for reduced orchestra. The concerts took place under the direction of the composer, with an orchestra fully responsive to his appeal.

The impression gathered might have been more satisfactory. The Symphony in E flat, known as Stravinsky's first important work, is of an honestly conventional structure, though of brilliant scoring. The leading melodic ideas betray as yet no striking originality, reflecting, as they do, the music of great masters prevalent at the time. Rimsky-Korsakov, Tchaikovsky, and Wagner seem to have generously contributed to the Symphony. Exception should be made in favour of the second movement, a Scherzo, in which one detects the future author of 'Petroushka.' Twenty-five years after the Symphony in E flat, Stravinsky composed the ballet, 'Apollon-Musagète,' now specially arranged for concert performance. These works betrayed an unexpected kinship. After having knocked at the door of the as yet undiscovered modal world, after having made a vigorous thrust into the domain of polytonality, Stravinsky falls back upon our old major system, lending at the same time perhaps too receptive an ear to the melodic and harmonic formulæ as practised by Bach, Handel, Gluck, and even by the romantic Berlioz.

Madame Ida Rubinstein produced a series of Ballets at the Grand Opéra. Some had been specially composed for her, while others were arranged from musical data of the past. Among the original works the most noteworthy was Ravel's 'Bolero,' a ballet composed on a single theme steadily worked out in a slow crescendo to a stormy climax (of great effect on the public). Stravinsky contributed the 'Baiser de la Fée,' charming music written in a punctilious style attesting to his frankly avowed admiration for Tchaikovsky. Honegger had arranged and scored music from Bach, and Milhaud had drawn upon Schubert and Liszt for his 'La Bien-Aimée,' while Mr. H. Sauguet figures on the programme with music for the ballet, 'David.'

Madame Rubinstein animated the ballets with her great talent as dancer and dramatic actress, and moreover gave them a sumptuous staging. M. W. Straram conducted the orchestra very efficiently.

Madame Beriza, in her new season of ballets and musical comedies, had the piquant idea of producing two little-known burlesque scores by Bach, namely, the 'Coffee Cantata' and 'We have a new Governor.' Another successful item presented by Madame Beriza is 'Angélique,' a musical comedy for which J. Ibert composed a very witty and good-humoured score.

The Russian Opera of Paris, about whose endeavours I spoke in some of my notes last year, have finally found a permanent home at the Gaîté-Lyrique. The first piece performed under the direction of M. Slaviansky d'Agreneff is Tchaikovsky's 'La Dame de Pique,' which we are asked to look upon as the composer's masterpiece. Stravinsky and numerous other eminent Russians have never dissimulated their admiration for the composer of the 'Pathetic' Symphony, proclaiming him as the real Russian musician. This is a point of national sensibility which interests exclusively the Russians. From the objectively musical point of view, as adopted by non-Russians, the score of 'La Dame de Pique' teems with futile formulæ void of any musical substance, while its grossly romantic declamation aims at theatrical effects of doubtful quality. There are surely other lyrical works of Russian masters more worthy of the attention of the Russian Opera of Paris.

Petro J. Petridis.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The last few weeks of the term were, as usual, fully occupied with concerts, recitals, and opera performances. There were three orchestral concerts under the direction of Dr. Adrian Boult, Dr. Malcolm Sargent, and Mr. W. H. Reed. At the concert of the First Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Adrian Boult, the Schubert Centenary was celebrated by performances of the composer's 'Tantum Ergo' for voices and orchestra, and the C major Symphony. At the other two concerts opportunities were given as usual to young conductors of the College to make a public appearance in charge of a full orchestra, no less than eighteen students, of whom four were young women enjoying this privilege. The operatic performances showed the fruits of study in current repertory, scenes from Verdi's 'Aida' and Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah' being presented with varied casts, accompanied by a full orchestra under the direction of Mr. H. Grünebaum. The last Patrons' Fund Orchestral Rehearsal of the term was devoted to the works of composers, of whom two were women. The programme included two movements of a Symphony by Cuthbert Osmond, some Variations by Mary Chater, and a Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra by Elizabeth Maconchy. One rather unusual and exciting concert deserves mention, that of the junior exhibitioners of the College, very youthful students who work under the guidance of the students engaged in the Teachers' Training Course. A programme of some two dozen items looked formidable on paper, but as many of the performers ran to and from the platform and took but two minutes over their solos, the whole concert took little more than an hour and a quarter.

The College terminal awards are held over until next month.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

Charles Edward Fry, at Hampstead, on December 11, in his eighty-third year. As a reciter he was specially identified with works in which music played an important part. This was probably due to the fact of his first appearance having been in Mendelssohn's 'Athalie,' wherein he took the part of reciter at nearly two hundred performances. He also appeared in Mendelssohn's 'Antigone and Œdipus' at the Crystal Palace (under Manns) and elsewhere. The recitation part in Mackenzie's 'The Dream of Jubal' was created by him in 1889 at the composer's request, and he appeared in almost every subsequent performance of the work, five of these being in Canada during Sir Alexander Mackenzie's tour of that country. Mr. Fry commissioned various musical settings of recitations, notably that of Longfellow's 'King Robert of Sicily,' the composer being John E. West. Some of these specially-written settings were given by him, with orchestra, at Queen's Hall Promenade concerts and elsewhere. As a Shakespearean writer he was eminent, and here again he made considerable use of music written specially. This side of his work developed into costume performances at various London theatres, in which he was assisted by a complete company, with draped stage instead of scenery. Twenty-eight of the plays were produced in this way. From 1900 to 1915 he was connected with Oxford House, Bethnal Green, where he gave a hundred and twenty-seven performances of twenty-one Shakespearean plays. As a teacher he was very successful; among his pupils were Lilian Braithwaite, Olive Kennett, Jane Bacon, Bertram Wallis, and Lewis Casson. Much of his teaching and examining were done at the London Academy of Music, where he was giving lessons within a few days of his death. For many years in the earlier part of his life he was sub-editor of the Musical Times, besides doing other responsible work for the house of Novello.

CHARLES WILLIAM PEARCE, at Bournemouth, on December 2, four days before his seventy-second birthday. He was a native of Salisbury, where he studied under C. J. Read and T. E. Aylward. Proceeding to London, he was articled to Dr. G. C. Verrinder, and had as teachers also W. S. Hoyte and E. J. Hopkins. His first appointment was to St. Martin's, Salisbury, when he was only fourteen years old. Subsequent posts were at St. Luke's, Old Street, and St. Clement's, Eastcheap. He graduated Mus. Doc. at Cambridge in 1884. For many years he was on the teaching staff of Trinity College of Music, and also director of studies at that institution. He examined much for the Royal College of Organists, Trinity College, and various Universities. He was Dean of the Faculty of Music at London University for four years. For twenty-four years he was joint editor with Dr. Charles Vincent and Dr. E. J. Hopkins of the Organist and Choirmaster. As author he was best known for some admirable text-books on many subjects, from singing and pianoforte-playing to the accompaniment of plainsong and the singing of the officiant's part in liturgical music. Perhaps his best books were on counterpoint: 'Students' Counterpoint,' 'Composers' Counterpoint,' and 'Modern Academic Counterpoint.' As composer he wrote some excellent church and organ music, wherein his ability to handle abstruse polyphony without being pedantic or dry was well exemplified. The Royal College of Organists owed much to his long service as member of the Council and honorary treasurer. He contributed copiously to musical journals, and was a frequent and welcome writer in the columns of the Musical Times.

HENRY DAVAN WETTON, in London, on November 2. He studied under Sir Frederick Bridge, and took up his first appointment—All Saints', Stoke Newington—in 1887. During his seven years' service at this post he became assistant to Bridge at Westminster Abbey, where he remained until 1896, holding office meanwhile at several London churches. In 1890 he went to Wells Cathedral as sub-organist. His chief work, however, came two years later, on his appointment as organist and director of the music at the Foundling Hospital. Here he held office until the Hospital was moved from London to the country a few years ago. During his long spell at the Foundling—thirty-four years—he brought the training of the children to a high standard; indeed, their singing, especially at the Christmas carol services, attained national repute. Among the many posts held at different periods by Dr. Wetton were those of professor of organ and other subjects at the Guildhall School of Music, organist at Alexandra Palace, conductor of the People's Palace choir, and of the London University Musical Society. He composed a good deal of Church music. At the time of his death he was organist and choirmaster at Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, where he was appointed shortly after leaving the Foundling Hospital. He was an esteemed member of the Royal College of Organists' Council, and also an examiner there.

FRANK HEDGES BUTLER, in London, on November 27, aged seventy-two. Though best known to the world at large as founder of the Royal Aero Club, a pioneer in motoring and ballooning, a traveller, and wine expert, he was also a skilled amateur musician. He played among the first violins in the Handel Festival as long ago as 1874, and was also an active member of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, and the Wandering Minstrels. The Lyric Club Orchestra was founded by him, and he was also founder and chairman of the Imperial Institute Orchestral Society.

HENRY VINCENT HIGGINS, a well-known London solicitor and ex-chairman of the Covent Garden Opera Syndicate. In this capacity he followed Sir Augustus Harris, and held office for a quarter of a century, retiring only a few years ago.

HERBERT SULLIVAN, nephew and heir of Sir Arthur Sullivan, in London, on November 26. He was part-author of a recent life of his uncle.

NOEL PONSONBY, at Oxford, suddenly, on December 10, aged thirty-seven. He was the eldest son of Chancellor Ponsonby, rector of St. Mary-le-Bow. His musical career began at St. George's Chapel, Windsor. From Repton he went to Trinity College, Oxford, where he graduated M.A. and Mus. Bac. In 1912 he was appointed organist of the Royal Naval College, Dartmouth, going thence two years later to be Director of Music at Marlborough College. His appointment to Ely Cathedral followed in 1919, and in 1926 he succeeded Dr. Henry Ley at Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford. His reputation, especially as a choir-trainer, stood very high. His personal charm was great, though fully realised only by those who got past his natural shyness of demeanour. The sudden and early death of one endowed with such high ideals and with ability to give them practical shape, is a severe loss to Church music.

ACHILLE SIMONETTI, in London, on November 19, aged sixty-eight. Born at Turin, on June 12, 1859, he became a pupil there of Francesco Bianchi, studying later with Gamba at Milan, and (for composition) under Pedrotti, late principal of Rossini's Conservatorio at Pesaro. After further instruction in violin-playing from Sivori, he toured France. In 1881 he went to Paris for further study, becoming a pupil of Dancla for violin and Massenet for counterpoint. His next stay was at Nice, where he established a quartet with d'Ambrosio. In 1887 he came to England to tour with the Marie Rose Company and to play with the pianist Benno Schönberger. Ultimately he settled in London, where he became well known as soloist, and member of the London Trio, which he founded with Amina Goodwin and W. E. Whitehouse. In 1912 he was appointed violin professor at the Royal Irish Academy of Music. With Esposito and Twelvetrees he took part in many trio-recitals at Dublin, also leading the Dublin Orchestral Society. He resigned his professorship in 1919. As composer he was best known for some attractive solos for violin, but he also wrote two string quartets and a couple of sonatas for violin and pianoforte.

OSCAR GEORGE THEODORE SONNECK, on October 30, in New York. He was born at New Jersey City on October 6, 1873, and was taken as a child to Germany, where he received most of his education, musical and general. His music teachers were Sundberger, Sachs (composition), Kwast (pianoforte), and Knorr (instrumentation). He also studied the viola. About 1900 he returned to America and became energetic as musicologist, writing a series of books on various aspects of American musical history. His most recent works were three volumes on Beethoven, written for the Centenary. He also composed a good deal, and published two volumes of poetry. As one of the organizers of the Beethoven Association he did much to make possible the publication a few years ago of the Krehbiel edition of Thayer's 'Life of Beethoven.' Under his editorship the Musical Quarterly attained a world-wide reputation among musical journals. For fifteen years he was librarian of the Music Section of the Library of Congress, where he did much valuable work. On resigning this office he became vice-chairman of the publishing house of Schirmer. The death of this indefatigable and unselfish worker leaves a big gap in American musical life.

HARRY DANCEY, on December 10, at Putney, aged sixty-six. He was organist at All Saints', Putney, and was a Mus. Bac. and F.R.C.O.

In response to the invitation of the Cologne branch of the International Society for Contemporary Music, a party of singers will visit Holland and Germany early in the New Year to give performances of British folk-music. Mr. Frank Howes will act as escort and accompanist. Among the party will be Mr. Tom Clough, the Northumbrian small-pipes player who was so successful recently in London.

IN HONOUR OF THE CITY

Fantasy for Chorus and Orchestra.

BY GEORGE DYSON

Words from a poem by WILLIAM DUNBAR (c. 1500).

Vocal Score, Two Shillings.

"One has only to come down to the chief concert of a society such as the Lincoln Musical Society to realise that armchairs and the sirens of the B.B.C. may tempt in vain when concerts are good, and that new works are being written to carry on a living choral tradition.

"To-night, Dr. George Dyson's 'In Honour of the City' was performed. The work is short (less than half-an-hour) and closely packed; the voice parts are diatonic and eminently singable, the orchestral accompaniment, gaily coloured; the whole, in Dunbar's favourite epithet, 'lusty' Contrast is lent by a section marked leggiero, ending with the chimes of Westminster, and a smooth, quiet section of great beauty extolling the river. The climax is reached by a chain of phrases over a ceaselessly moving bass and a riot of bells.

"The cantata is not difficult to sing if the choir is careful, as this Lincoln choir was, to watch its intonation and key changes, for the harmony is modern and constantly changing with bold effect; it reflects perfectly the vigour and picturesqueness of the words and the life of the times they depict."—The Times, November 29, 1928.

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

NOTE.—The booklet referred to above may be obtained free of all cost on application to Secretary, T., Cowling Institute, 71, Albion House, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1.

A MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE VIOLIN

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ AND JAMES BROWN

THE purpose of this Work is to provide, in one systematic and comprehensive scheme, all that is necessary for the acquirement of the Art of Modern Violin Playing.

"A Modern School for the Violin" consists of Six Books devoted to Daily Technical Practice, Six Books of Studies for Violin alone, and a number of Pieces with Pianoforte Accompaniment, the Violin parts being specially edited for the purposes of teaching.

SECTION A.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE. IN SIX BOOKS.

The foundation of "A Modern School for the Violin" is laid by means of a series of Six Books dealing exclusively with the important subject of DAILY TECHNICAL PRACTICE. The First Book of Technical Practice (Book 1A) is limited to the 1st Position; the Second Book (2A) to the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the Third Book (3A) to the first five Positions; and so on. Bowings and other technical devices are introduced in a similarly progressive manner throughout. Each Book of Technical Practice is divided into "Lessons" (or Chapters), and each Lesson contains a number of short repeating Exercises on some definite point of Violin Technique—as Fingering, Bowing, &c., with the needful explanations. Included in each Book will be found a complete set of Scales and Arpeggi, arranged according to the particular stage of advancement reached.

Taken as a whole, this section is intended to facilitate, and to insist on, a thorough, steady, and continuous progress in the mastery of the Instrument, this being the only possible means of preparing the groundwork for artistic achievement with all its lasting delights.

SECTION B.—STUDIES. IN SIX BOOKS.

Section B is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in Six Books. Each Book of Studies (Section B) is carefully co-ordinated, in respect of difficulty and range of subject, with the correspondingly numbered Book of Technical Practice (Section A). Thus the First Book of Studies (1B) is written in the 1st Position; the Second Book (2B) in the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Positions; the 3rd Book (3B) in all Positions up to and including the 5th; and so on. It should further be explained that the two Sections are designed to complement one another, and that the "School" must be practised, not in single Books of Technical Practice and Studies alternately, but in pairs. Thus, Books 1A and 1B are to be taken concurrently, then Books 2A and 2B, 3A and 3B, and so on, and the appropriate pairs are now issued bound together in cloth (see Cloth Bindings below).

THE ST. LUKE PASSION

J. S. BACH

Arranged by the Rev. A. HASTINGS KELK and J. MICHAEL DIACK

Staff, 2s. 6d. Sol-fa (Choruses), 1s.

This early work of Bach's has many interesting and beautiful features. It supplies the need for a short, dramatic, and dignified setting of the Passion, and is written throughout in a simple style quite within the compass of ordinary Church Choirs or small Choral Societies. Time of performance, 50 minutes.

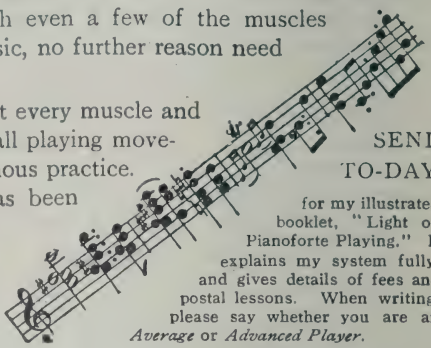
The Pianist's Hands

The Times says: "The excellence of Mr. Macdonald Smith's methods has been abundantly proved."

PREVALENT among pianists is the idea that you cannot play well unless you have a special sort of hand; this is a mistake. It is obvious, however, that the hands must be in perfect condition, otherwise the many technical difficulties to be overcome will be found insuperable. For a pianist every single muscle of the hands and arms must move the instant it is required to do so, and if this fails to be the case with even a few of the muscles brought into play in any complicated passage of music, no further reason need be sought to account for failure.

Let the "From Brain to Keyboard" System perfect every muscle and nerve in your hands and give you instant control over all playing movements without any of the usual drudgery and monotonous practice. Why not learn something about the System that has been used by many of our eminent musicians.



SEND TO-DAY

for my illustrated booklet, "Light on Pianoforte Playing." It explains my system fully, and gives details of fees and postal lessons. When writing, please say whether you are an Average or Advanced Player.

MENTAL-HEARING AND MENTAL STUDY.

THE ability to HEAR MENTALLY seems to be possessed by few students, as the following from a well-known Musical Paper proves :

"Harmony on paper is a dead thing except to those who can hear what they see—the possession of about one student in a thousand."

Mental-hearing will enable the student to hear in his mind the sounds of the notes he is writing on the paper; they will not be mere soundless signs, but each will convey a definite sound to him, and until they do so all written harmony is a waste of time.

The acquisition of Mental-hearing will materially assist the practical work of the pianoforte and organ student, for if the student can hear mentally he will be encouraged to study mentally. Mental-hearing is the key to mental study, and Mental study is the key to more rapid progress. The mastery of this subject will also improve the student's sight-reading, memorising, and transposing.

Mental-hearing is a necessity for candidates for Diplomas such as L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., A.R.C.O., &c., and this work will also be of the greatest help to pupils preparing aural tests for the Associated Board Examinations.

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

NOTE.—The booklet referred to above may be obtained free of all cost on application to Secretary, T., Cowling Institute, 71, Albion House, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1.

Can you play without music?

Or is it just the one weak spot you are always conscious of whenever you are asked to play? There is an indescribable feeling of freedom and confidence when you know that your memory will not fail you. If memorizing is your difficulty, send a postcard to-day for my Free Booklet entitled The

MASTER-METHOD OF MEMORY-PLAYING

Please state whether you play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ, and if a moderate or advanced player.

A New Departure
ARS VIVENDI - BREATHING -

ORDINARY breathing presses stomach and internal organs downwards, causing them to drop below their proper positions in the body, and seriously interfering with their freedom of action. This entails manifold evils, such as indigestion, depression, lung, liver, and kidney affections, women's ailments, spinal curvature, breakdown of arch of foot, &c.

Ars Vivendi Breathing completely reverses the position, lifting the body upwards, freeing the organs from pressure and constriction, keeping them in their proper places, instead of 'dropping,' and making the step light and exhilarating. Nasal congestion, the cause of recurring colds and coughs, yields without need of operation, weakness of throat disappears, and the diaphragm (basis of health and voice) gains power.

The result is speedy improvement in general health and Ability to Concentrate, as well as Ease of Production, Control of Breath, Resonance, and Rich Quality of Voice in Speaking and Singing.

All smoking affects the throat!

Pipe, cigar or cigarette—no matter which—the delicate membranes of the throat object to smoke, which eventually produces irritation, either mild or severe. To prevent this, take an 'Allenburys' Glycerine and Black Currant Pastille occasionally between smokes and let it dissolve in the mouth. Containing pure glycerine and the luscious fruit juice of ripe black currants, they are delightfully soothing.

F.R.C.O. AND A.R.C.O. PAPER WORK

A SPECIAL COURSE OF CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS for the July, 1929, F.R.C.O. and A.R.C.O. Examinations is now commencing. The chief reason why this system of tuition is so successful is that pupils are taught how to work. Experience has proved that a large number of candidates fail because they do not reach a high enough standard in their work, which is often the result of training on wrong lines. Now in this system of tuition, pupils are taught to produce work which is above the standard required by the examiners.

F.R.C.O. pupils are trained to work on a definite plan in such tests as the String Quartet, Part-Song, Solo, so as to acquire speed, which is a most vital factor, especially in the afternoon, when so many candidates come to grief.

Hints on how to study the score selected for the January examination as well as a complete analysis (which will give answers to likely questions) will be sent to all pupils.

A.R.C.O. pupils receive special help with Free Counterpoint, Pianoforte Accompaniment, and Four-Part Harmony. Questions on Choir-Training, Musical History, and Musical Form are included in the lessons.

The whole aim of this method is to teach the principles which underlie all highly artistic music, and also the application of these principles to examination work, so that a pupil who is thus equipped is enabled not only to pass the F.R.C.O. or A.R.C.O. examination, as the case may be, but also to develop to the utmost the musical ability with which he is endowed.

MUSIC IN THE CINEMA

By LEONID SABANEEV

A few years ago it would have been absurd to treat music in the cinema as a serious musical problem. But the times change rapidly, and the cinema is now perhaps a more important factor in artistic social life than opera and drama were in their day. It is in the fullest sense the 'ruler of the thoughts' of contemporary society, and from the point of view of its artistic significance and value it becomes necessary and important to examine all its component parts, amongst which music (possibly to its own misfortune) finds itself included.

Æsthetically the general question of the cinema as an art has usually been the subject of controversy, and the dispute has been carried on by interested parties who, moreover, are very little versed in æsthetics. As the dramatic artist—ordinarily of a far more cultured type than the cinema artist—is, as a rule, quite unable to judge his art æsthetically, what can we expect of the servants of the 'Tenth Muse'—the taciturn priestess of the 'Great Dumb God'? More often than not they are æsthetically as dumb as their Muse.

Perhaps the Tenth Muse's too ready acceptance of the embraces of the god of commerce predetermined the paths she followed, which became far more primitive and standardised than might have been the case. Music, which was added to the cinema as an obligatory background, also found itself in a strange situation. Few can explain its significance in connection with the cinema play. But the vital, worldly fact is that the cinema proved to be unacceptable without music, and left a sense of purposelessness. Possibly the rôle of music in the cinema is just to fill the sound-vacuum which would otherwise accompany the séances of the Great Dumb God. In its æsthetic nature the cinema is the illustration of fragments of the text, like the pictures in a book with descriptions printed beneath them, except that in the case of the cinema the pictures are the centre of attraction. The rôle of music would seem to be the tonal illustration of the pictures on the screen—one might call it illustration of the second order. Usually (particularly in the early years of this art) music in the cinema strove to be descriptive; it wanted to incarnate in tone the moods evoked by the pictures, and as it was generally in amateur and inexperienced hands the task was performed with artlessness and imperfection. Its part here was purely ancillary, and no lofty æsthetic problems trespassed on the naïve and self-confident position of the cinema illustrator.

It may be said that in performing this service music lost its immemorial architectonic quality and harmonious proportions; all the defects of programme and operatic music appeared in their most exaggerated form, and only the infinite naïveté of the whole combination saved it from reproaches of an æsthetic character. It was so unassuming, so amateurish, that as a rule æsthetic thought was simply not concerned with it.

However, the years passed, and in a society which required and received this art specific customs were created. A solid tradition for music in the cinema was established, a persistent demand for this kind of music was set up. By degrees certain peculiarities differentiating the cinema reception of music from the normal reception were explored. It appeared first of all that in this act of reception music generally attracts a purely superficial notice. As I remarked before, it merely fills the vacuum of silence. In fine, it cannot obtain the attention it receives at a concert, where it is the only centre of attraction, or even in opera, where it divides the honours with the stage and the subject. Hence it became evident that music in the cinema was in no way obliged to concern itself with the nicety of detail to which we are accustomed in ordinary music. It had only to be a decorative background, and even its coincidence with the events depicted on the screen might be extremely relative. This lowering of the demands made on music in the cinema, due to its superficial position in this art, is further augmented by the fact that the musical qualifications and experience of the cinema audience are generally less than those of frequenters of concerts and opera, and hence the former is less exacting as regards the details of the musical tissue.

This essentially amateurish status of music has stamped its impress on the whole of its share in this business. The cinema, for all its immense technical development, has not been able to raise the musical background to the level of a genuine art. The curious blend of the technical and the artistic which has hitherto compelled many æsthetes to cast doubts upon the assumption that the cinema is an art and not an adaptation (a technical form of art, such as the phonograph and the wireless, which nobody regards as separate arts), this blend imparts to the musical accompaniment the quality of an applied and technical and not a free art—a quality which prevents the creation of something monumental and valuable.

Undoubtedly from the technical point of view the position of music in the cinema is strange and incompatible. We may deny to the cinema the significance of a self-sufficing art, or of a branch of art, but we cannot withhold our astonishment at its unprecedented technical perfection in its own sphere. The music section of the cinema, on the contrary, is amazingly primitive and lacking in technical perfection. The association of the technically accurate projecting apparatus, in which the mechanical spirit of our age seems to be completely reflected, and the naïve, amateur musical botchery, which has hardly kept pace with the picture and follows the principles and makes use of the resources of primitive intuition, produces, on me at least, an impression of a simultaneous combination of the aeroplane and the 17th-century stage-coach. From such a combination nothing artistic can result. As the essence of the cinema consists in its technical mechanicalness, it is clear that to achieve the homogeneity of the component parts of the entertainment the accompaniment must first of all be mechanised, and become as mechanically accurate as the film itself.

I myself am certain that we now have to reckon with the cinema as a conquering art. In its time opera also provoked the attack of strict and orthodox æsthetes, but this did not prevent it from developing and strengthening itself and gradually removing from its path the æsthetic objections to its existence. The cinema now find itself in a similar or even more victorious position. Furthermore, I foresee in the cinema the vanquisher and destroyer of opera, previously the most democratic form of the musico-spectacular reception of art; and therefore musicians, and especially composers, should not be deterred from studying and penetrating more deeply into the nature of their undoubted master in the future.

Almost at its birth the cinema was captured by commercialism, of which it bears deeper traces than those impressed upon opera. This commercialism was the cause of the inevitable haste with which the separate parts of the cinema organism were put together, and particularly with which music was tacked on to it. The naïve and amateurish position of the latter was not due to the essential nature of the cinema, but appears to be the consequence of a bad tradition rather than of necessity.

There can be no doubt that commercial interests originated the practice of extracting quotations from various compositions and forming an æsthetically intolerable hotch-potch, and gave rise to the habit of an artless improvisation which has little æsthetic connection with the actual character of the spectacular portion. It should, of course, be natural and normal to admit for the cinema the composition of special music, accurately applied to definite moments of the film, and (as is expected of any self-respecting art) making no concessions to the bad taste of the public nor, especially, to its ignorance and inability to perceive the inferior quality of what is being offered to it. The task of writing music for the cinema is an honourable and serious one, capable of powerfully stimulating the composer's inspiration. The fact that many serious musicians have ventured into this sphere proves that it is by no means a derogatory undertaking, nor inconsistent with a lofty musical art. But the problem has all along been unstable and uncertain, simply because it has not been thoroughly thought out from a technical point of view. If music wants to be something in the cinema, and not merely an accessory like the music at a banquet, it must take to itself the mechanical nature of the cinema. It must be written in exact accordance with the film, just as the music of an opera conforms strictly to the text. The film and the music should be composed simultaneously and form a unity, and not a fortuitous blend or combination as is the case now, when the film is something strictly definite, whereas the music is a casual improvisation and may not be twice alike for the same film.

Composers, as I have indicated, should themselves be interested in this progress, in this salvation of their position in the cinema. Moreover, it possibly opens up new prospects for the musician. Hitherto the film has been the centre of interest and the music an accessory. But other forms of combination are conceivable in which the rôles will be reversed, the centre of interest, as in opera, being transferred to the music (and the text, should there be any), whilst the film would become the illustrative factor. (I have said previously that the essential nature of the cinema is in the main typically illustrative.) The musical form, of the vocal cantata type, accompanied by the film as the illustrator of its situations and moods, is exceedingly natural and might prove to be extremely vital. The film would then provide an actual revelation, as it were, of the programme of the music. I am convinced that many existing compositions would gain in impressiveness by being worked up in this way, particularly Wagner's music-dramas, which in many respects are not dramas at all but grandiose symphonic poems with a programme partly realisable on the stage. A film giving what might be called 'vision-pictures' accompanying a simultaneous concert performance of the music might be capable of producing on contemporary audiences a greater impression than the operatic stage, which is cumbrous, sluggish, and always conventional. The adaptation of music to the cinema, or, to be more exact, the symbiosis of music and the cinema, might be æsthetically reasoned out and developed, justified, and established on the artistic plane, and at the same time there might be combinations in which music would occupy the first and not the second place, as it does in opera for instance.

In my opinion the sphere of the typical, normal cinema has become too traditional, too infected with commercialism, to allow of music's gaining for itself here a more important position than it now occupies. To break through this front is impossible, and music is perpetually doomed to play a secondary part, and is reduced to amateurish improvisation, or the not less casual and stereotyped quotation from existing works in an inartistic sequence. The composition of special music can alone impart new life to the business, and I think that composers have up till now paid too little attention to the possibilities offered them in this direction, and have unjustifiably regarded this problem as something in the nature of a profanation. The ordinary cinema music profanes art far more than a serious attitude towards the question of writing special music for the film, in which I cannot but see, firstly, an analogy with the composition of opera, and, secondly, a prospect of entirely new and interesting possibilities for illustrative music free from the sluggishness of the theatrical stage. It is even possible that music, possessing the gift of sudden transitions into entirely different moods, harmonizes in this respect far better with the cinema than with the theatre, which is deliberate and too material, whereas the cinema, like music, can change its setting and its scale at a moment's notice, and with all its mechanicalness proves to be far less material and more abstract. It would not, of course, be satisfactory if the cinema music, working under cinema conditions, were restricted to the technical resources of opera. The musician must initiate a new form. He must give unity to the style of writing which has hitherto existed in the cinema—the primitive quoting from various compositions, and the artless combination of these excerpts. And as the opera form in its present state has been developed from the continued struggle between the requirements of the stage and the demands of the musical material, so in the new art of the future, which will organically synthetise the cinema and music, we shall obtain a certain form providing ample scope for the screen and its demands, and at the same time remaining purely musical. I say once more that to me personally the screen and music seem to be more organically united and less hostile to each other than music and the stage.

I anticipate still greater scope from the converse problem, as yet unachieved—from music accompanied by and not accompanying the screen. It may be that on this plane Scriabin's mysterious dreams of his 'Symphony of Light' may find incarnation. Possibly the secret intentions of all programme music have in the depths of their nature invoked the aid of the screen, as the illustrator of the programme. When programme music was originated there was, of course, no cinema, and the world had no idea of it. But are not such works as Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony and Liszt's 'Les Préludes' supremely cinematographic subjects? They, and others, are just an assemblage of visions surrounding the musical tissue and arising out of it. Music has always adhered to a certain visual incarnation of its own, to certain dreams evoked by it. These dreams cannot be transmitted by the stage, which is too coarse and material a medium, but they are entirely within the powers of the cinema and in full accord with its character. That is its sphere, all the resources of which have not hitherto been exhausted.

ORCHESTRAL BALANCE

By Tom S. Wotton

Glazunov* divides orchestration into three classes:

1. The orchestra sounds well as soon as the execution is fairly correct, but wonderful after sufficient rehearsals.
2. The effects are only realised after painful efforts on the part of the conductor and performers.
3. In spite of every effort of the orchestra and conductor, the sonority is never satisfactory.

Now, orchestration depends mainly on contrast, colour, and balance. And the greatest of these is balance. Contrast is easy to obtain, and colour is unavoidable in the kaleidoscope of the modern orchestra, and the appropriateness of each is largely a matter of opinion. But the secret of a good balance is known only to the adepts, and is, or should be, a matter of fact. Without much doubt, Glazunov's classification is based on balance.

In his first class are works that almost might be said to 'play themselves.' Given an orchestra of musicians who are unanimous as regards tempo, and will follow faithfully the dynamic and other indications, the result should at least be intelligible. A conductor is necessary, since a performance to be wholly satisfactory should be swayed by one mind, and it is he, aided by sufficient rehearsals, who changes the 'well' into 'wonderful.'

But with compositions of the second class the conductor has to assume a dual rôle. In addition to his ordinary duties, he has to become part-composer, and by sundry devices seek to simulate that balance the actual composer has been too ignorant or too careless to achieve. He has to see that the orchestra does not follow the indications faithfully. And a clever conductor, by relegating some parts to the background, and bringing others to the fore, will often produce the semblance to a proper orchestral balance that may deceive even the elect. Naturally, too, he has to do something in the way of adjustment, when he is presenting with an orchestra of fifty or sixty a work of the first class intended for one of a hundred, and vice versâ, when he is giving a Mozart or Beethoven Symphony with a body of musicians considerably larger than the composer anticipated.

Orchestration of the third class need not detain us, though occasional examples of it may be found in the works of some of the greatest masters. Nor is it necessary to dwell on the methods of certain conductors, who, to gain the facile triumph of a 'new reading,' will ignore deliberately the indications in pieces of the first class.

The cases mentioned above—where the orchestra is larger or smaller than the demands of the composer—were probably not contemplated in Glazunov's three classes, which were framed on the assumption that the orchestra itself was fully appointed, and properly adjusted as regards the number of strings, wood-wind, and brass. The balance the Russian master had in mind was one dependent on the progression of the separate parts, the laying-out of the chords, the registers of the various instruments, and a variety of details too technical to be here discussed. But as these presuppose a correct balance of the three departments of the orchestra, it is evident that the size and disposition of the latter are of importance, for if our perceptions are blunted in respect to the broader aspects of balance, we are unlikely to appreciate the more subtle. And our ideas of the former must tend to become somewhat confused, if we are constantly hearing the same work under different conditions. 'In the course of one revolving moon' we may hear it given by three orchestras of sixty, eighty, and a hundred respectively, played on a gramophone, and broadcast by wireless; and matters are often complicated by the fact, that in the two last cases the size and disposition of the orchestra are unknown quantities,* and that in the first three the several performances may be given in halls of different acoustic properties. It is true that there are such things as full scores. But, as actual sounds must of necessity be more vivid than imaginary ones, it is impossible for even the cleverest score-reader to avoid having his conceptions of what things ought to be disturbed by what things are.

The painter is more fortunate than the musician. Even though his favourite masterpieces be housed in galleries too distant to be visited with the frequency he would wish, he can, if need be, always refresh his memory by faithful reproductions. And he has merely to recall something which remains unchanged. The musician, on the other hand, has to remember something varying from one fraction of a second to the next. In terms of sight, a musical work is comparable to a long and varied procession, of which it would puzzle the most keen-eyed painter to memorise all the details. Certain items will for ever remain fixed in his mental vision, but, of the rest, some will have vanished entirely, while others, recalled with difficulty, will not be true to the original. The musician is in much the same position as regards his procession of sounds, but with the advantage that he can have it repeated. It is the same, and yet not quite the same. The bevy of maidens have not quite the same stereotyped smiles, not quite the same shade of frocks, the clowns not quite the same antics, the representatives of Brotherhoods and Societies not quite the same air of bored conviviality. Or, translated into music, the brass has not quite the same tone, there are but two bassoons instead of the specified four, and the number of the strings has not only altered, but the basses do not now bear the same ratio to the whole. It is this 'not quite the same,' that is the trouble! It militates against our possessing a rigid standard of balance in a broader sense, with the inevitable corollary that we are purblind in respect to its finer gradations. Modern audiences are disposed to accept as clever orchestration mere undigested chunks of tone-colour, a lamentable state of affairs of which some composers have not scrupled to take advantage.

The expert naturally is not in the same state of blissful innocence. But he too is affected by this lack of a measuring rod. I have before me two notices by reputable critics of a performance of an Elgar Symphony. The one declares it to have been 'undeniably the finest' he ever heard. The other says that 'the music was simply ploughed through . . . no balance of tone, and extraordinarily ugly outbursts from the brass'—a criticism totally at variance with the other writer's 'incomparable in its understanding of Elgar, and masterly in its technical handling.' Now, a conductor may exhibit an understanding of Elgar, or anyone else, with an unquestionably inadequate orchestra. But he cannot give a superlatively fine performance with such a medium.

It is true that the Symphony appears to have been given under somewhat unfavourable circumstances, being placed at the end of a long programme. A number of the listeners had trains or buses to catch, and, with the thoughtful courtesy that distinguishes many members of a musical audience, only remembered the fact in the middle of a movement, choosing by preference the softer passages as the auspicious moment for forcing their way through the jungle of unwilling knees. Evidently not the hour for coldly dispassionate criticism. Yet even this should not affect the question of balance, whether the fault of the conductor or a disproportioned orchestra. Balance should be, as I have said, a matter of fact, as cut and dried as whether the tenors of a choir are strong enough to struggle against the other parts, or whether the choir itself is too large or too small for the orchestra that accompanies it. That two experts cannot agree on this point, seems to go to prove my contention that nobody can avoid being influenced by this lack of a standard of comparison.

Performances on an orchestra vary like those on a pianoforte, owing to the idiosyncrasies of conductor or player. They must vary, too, as regards tone. But, while a pianoforte always remains a pianoforte, no matter what the name of the maker, an orchestra is not always an orchestra, at any rate within the meaning of this article. What idea would a frequenter of pianoforte recitals form of a Beethoven Sonata, a Chopin Ballade, if he heard it now on an instrument in which the treble overpowered the bass, now the bass the treble, now with the middle octave inaudible? The parallel must not be pressed too hard, but, in one direction or another, do not our modern orchestras vary as much, or more? And this variation is not that required for the due performances of such contrasted works as (say) 'The Planets' and Ravel's Pavane, but in those of the same composition.

* An enterprising firm suggests the use of their miniature full scores with gramophone records. The plan is good, and adds no doubt to our purely musical enjoyment. But, for purposes of study it is useless, unless we are told exactly to what we are listening. That the record is made from an actual performance, tells us nothing. The student may fondly imagine that his machine is giving him, in some excerpt from 'The Ring,' Wagner's orchestration played by the instruments specified in the score, while he is only hearing an arrangement by Zumpe, or some other satellite of the master. Perhaps someday the gramophone companies may see their way to issuing records of standard works guaranteed to be produced by an orchestra of the precise number and disposition demanded by the composer—the 'Siegfried Idyll' with the small body of strings intended, the Beethoven Symphonies played by the band of fifty to sixty the composer anticipated, and in modern works the full complement of wood, brass, harps, and strings marked in the score.

Probably most musicians would consider harmony as more important than orchestration. And, if they are treated as separate entities, no doubt it is. There is, however, such a thing as orchestral harmony, which is apart from that of the student's exercise, or suited to a keyboard. When a Brahms first writes his Symphonies for four hands on two pianofortes, and then scores them for orchestra, his harmony is likely to be of greater value than his instrumentation. With a composer who thinks orchestrally, the case is different. The harmony and the orchestration are so mutually dependent, so inextricably mingled, that we cannot tamper with the one without disturbing the other. An orchestra can, indeed, be modified to a considerable extent—such extent being relative to the skill of the performers and conductor, the size of the concert-hall, and other things—without the harmony being affected. But there is a limit to this variation. When that is passed, the harmony suffers. This may be a truism, but, like many another, it is acknowledged more in theory than in practice. If some modern work were given with the actual notes of the harmony altered, someone would raise an outcry. But, when the orchestra is so mutilated and distorted as, to all intents and purposes, to bring about the same result, few complaints are heard.

The mutilation and distortion of an orchestra are naturally not connected with its size. A dwarf is not of necessity deformed; and a small orchestra may be as perfectly balanced as a string quartet. The pity is that this is so seldom the case. Unfortunately the dwarf is not content to remain a dwarf, and in its efforts to imitate its larger brethren it is apt to dislocate some portion of its anatomy. If an orchestral movement be played on an organ, the result will be more satisfactory when the music is translated into true organ language than if an attempt be made, by means of fancy stops and gadgets, to imitate the orchestral instruments and effects. But when arranging for a small orchestra a work conceived for a large one, how often is the true idiom of the former preserved? The main idea of the arranger seems to be to retain as far as possible the heavy brass of the original score. So long as he can have three trombones and a couple of trumpets (cornets) for the Pilgrims' Chorus in the 'Tannhäuser' Overture, it appears to be a matter of indifference to him that the scanty wood-wind and meagre strings cannot contend with the brass unison. If excuses be made, they would probably be for the absence of the third trumpet of Wagner's score, and that, owing to the stinginess of the management, the tuba part had to be omitted. This picture may be overdrawn, but it contains more than a modicum of truth. And it is not a particular attack on the minor orchestras of to-day. The same craving for the more noisy instruments was exhibited in the small orchestras of the past century, and, in a way, it is understandable, since nothing can replace the clear clang of the trumpet, or the majesty of the trombone. The question is, whether their colouring cannot be bought at too dear a price. As that price is the disarrangement of the balance, the answer, from a musical point of view, seems to be in the negative.

To define an orchestra has never been easy, and in these days, when an ordinary pianoforte trio, or any fortuitous conglomeration of instruments including a saxophone and the utensils manipulated by a jazz drummer, is dignified by the name of 'orchestra,' the task becomes impossible. Setting aside such a self-explanatory term as 'string orchestra,' it might be described as a body of musicians containing representatives of the strings, wood-wind, brass, and percussion instruments in proper proportion. But until we have fixed ideas on what that proportion should be, the definition is worthless.

It may be good to have small orchestras scattered over the country, even though their disposition would not satisfy the least exacting expert. Possibly they would help to spread the light, though it be but dimmed. At the same time, do not let us blind ourselves to the fact that ill-balanced orchestras accustom audiences to ill-balanced instrumentation, and hence, from an educational point of view, leave very much to be desired. Few would argue that a work indifferently performed furthered the cause of music, and between faulty execution and an imperfect instrument there is little to choose.

The balance of an orchestra depends on many things, but one of the principal is without doubt the number of strings compared with that of the wind. And in dealing with the question, the influence of Wagner—both direct and indirect—cannot be overlooked. Direct, since in 'The Ring' he specified a number of strings considerably less than had hitherto been deemed necessary to balance the wind instruments; and indirect, because so many performances of the work, or excerpts therefrom, have been given, in which the ratio has been reduced still more. Berlioz is sometimes held responsible for the increase in the number of the brass and wood-wind, and, in one sense, perhaps this is true. But we must remember that his use of extra wind was occasional rather than habitual, and, what alone concerns us, that he clung to the classical proportion of strings. I would add that the fact of Wagner having designed 'The Ring' for a concealed orchestra, has no bearing on the present argument. He imagined—erroneously, as it happened—that the whole orchestra would be equally muted, and thus his calculations of balance must have been the same as though it were exposed according to the usual custom, that is, under conditions familiar to most of us. That the orchestra nowadays at Bayreuth is different from Wagner's specifications, cannot be here discussed, if only for the reason that its disposition is 'wropt in mystery.' Since the concealment of the orchestra affected certain departments of it more than others, some re-adjustment was necessary in the way of doubling particular parts. How much further has been done (if at all) to improve the Master's original balance, which, as we have seen, was not dependent on a concealed orchestra, we do not know.*

* A history of the Bayreuth orchestra is sorely needed. Many musicians have dreamt of a concealed one, and, if it is to be a feature of future opera-houses, records of the attempts of various conductors to readjust the imperfections of the first would be invaluable.

The last sentence may shock devout Wagnerians, who like to believe that their idol's orchestration (which, by the way, they very seldom hear) is perfection. Yet if we consider the subject dispassionately, we shall be forced to admit the probability of Wagner having made a good many miscalculations in the orchestration of his gigantic work. Some of these he might have avoided if he had had an opportunity of hearing 'Lohengrin' before he commenced 'The Rhinegold.' But his exile forbade that, and he had to rely on his recollections of 'Tannhäuser,' which were of no great assistance in dealing with the totally different disposition of the orchestra in 'The Ring.'

A NOTE ON THE NATURE OF OPERA

By Dyneley Hussey

In the first place we must accept the premiss that opera is a definite and independent form governed by laws which do not necessarily apply to either music or drama. Without that premiss we can get nowhere. There are, indeed, enthusiasts who derive all their enjoyment of opera solely from the music. They ignore the dramatic action and the spectacle, and are content to sit with their eyes closed or even out of sight of the stage altogether. They allow their minds to be absorbed entirely in the music. It may be admitted that the average production at Covent Garden, in which singers from half a dozen different foreign opera-houses act in different styles and even sing in different languages before antiquated scenery that was in some instances originally painted for a different opera, gives some encouragement to the adoption of this attitude. Nor can it be denied that a great deal of pleasure may be derived from merely listening to many operatic masterpieces. But this is only to say that the music of a great opera must have some intrinsic interest, whether it take the form of a continuous succession of good melodies (as in Handel and Verdi) or of an elaborate weft of musical ideas (as in the finales of Mozart and in the Wagnerian operas).

While, however, great pleasure may be derived from these things, the main point of the music—the reason why it takes a particular form and develops in a particular direction—will be lost if its dramatic purport is ignored. It is obvious that our pleasure is greater if in listening, say, to the famous Quartet in 'Rigoletto,' we follow not only the delightful complexity of the score (taking voices and orchestra as one), but also the cross-currents of the dramatic situation and the interplay of character which are depicted in the music. When it comes to an incident such as that which occurs in the first Act of 'Der Rosenkavalier,' when Ochs interrupts the tenor with a thump on the table and a shout of 'Als Morgengabe!' the brilliant musical point made by Strauss is simply unintelligible unless we appreciate also the dramatic point made by von Hofmannsthal.

Now the Quartet in 'Rigoletto' is good music, but hardly good drama, since the action is held up just when, according to the canons, it should move swiftly. The incident in 'Der Rosenkavalier' is, contrariwise, excellent comedy, but hardly musical at all, since it passes so swiftly that music has no time to deploy its forces.* But both are good opera. In each case the music and the drama play into one another's hands, and by a generous policy of give-and-take (drama yielding in the one, music in the other) co-operate to give the maximum of effect to the scenes.

Let us take these scenes as types of two different, but equally good, elements in opera. The Quartet represents all those moments when the dramatic action stands still while the composer sums up in his music the emotional content of the scene. The principle is the same as that which actuated Shakespeare, when he put into the mouth of his character a beautiful poetic speech which at once relieves the tension and reveals the inmost significance of the drama. Only in the poetic drama do we find anything comparable with this reflective and resuming power of music in opera. This power is shown in many various ways. The first and simplest form is in the 'aria,' and if you who have always thought it ridiculous that the operatic hero or heroine should waste time in singing about the position of affairs instead of getting on with the business of rescue or escape, would only accept this convention as you are presumably prepared to accept the convention of Macbeth's soliloquies, your understanding of opera as an art-form would be enlarged.

From the air it is only a step to the duet and the other ensembles, in which also the emotions of the characters are held suspended in a musical movement.† It may be very unnatural for Pamina and Papageno to indulge in a Platonic discussion of the state of matrimony when they ought to be packing her traps and quitting the palace. It may be still more unnatural for two pairs of singers, conveniently possessed of contralto and tenor, soprano and baritone voices, to stand on either side of a wall and sing in perfect harmony at the tops of their very loud voices, though each couple is supposed to be inaudible to the other. But if we are to abolish things like 'Bei Männern, welche Liebe fühlen' from 'The Magic Flute,' and the Quartet from 'Rigoletto,' we may as well give up the idea of opera at all, since that would be to take away all possibility of musical development and would reduce opera to a dreary recitative, even if so much use of music could be justified. It may be admitted that the convention becomes ridiculous when characters leave the stage in very slow haste to hundredfold repetitions of 'Andiamo.' Is it unfair to plead that this is only the abuse of a convention which is not necessarily bad in itself? Because feeble dramatists have reduced the soliloquy and the 'aside' to absurdity, that is no justification for condemning as inadmissible these very useful instruments in the dramatist's equipment.

It may be said that Wagner managed to do without these reflective ensembles. That, however, is not altogether true, for all he did was to banish the voices from them. With his wonderful orchestral resource he summed up his situations in long symphonic movements. These are in most instances, though not always, put to further use, covering the time necessary for a change of scene. Moreover, they usually carry the dramatic action forward as well as resuming the emotions of the scene which is just over. But in principle the Rhine-journey and the Funeral March in 'Götterdämmerung' are in the same class as the ensembles of Mozart and Verdi. The long duet in 'Tristan' is another example of Wagner's adaptation of the convention in which the voices are retained although they are rarely heard in concert.

* I speak only of Ochs's angry exclamation; for Strauss has led up to the point with an abundance of musical resource. Having prepared the way, he steps aside for his dramatist to take the stage.

† This does not apply to the Mozartian Finale, wherein the action, so far from being suspended, is carried forward with an ever increasing hurry and excitement. In these movements, of which the Finale of Act 1 in 'Don Giovanni' is the finest example, music and drama join hands in perfect comity, each enhancing the effect of the other.

This duet is, by the way, another proof of Wagner's perfect understanding of what is wanted of an operatic librettist. With all respect to those learnèd commentators who have attempted to expound the philosophy of Tristan and Isolde, the words of this duet consist of something very like nonsense, and I think we should be foolish to seek any meaning in them alone. The music expounds their meaning as clearly as can be, but it is not a meaning that can be put coherently into words. The text is, in fact, a mere peg on which to hang the most passionate expression of mutual love in the whole of music. Verbal clearness is here of no account, and it would be quite impossible to achieve the same effect with words alone. Equally the effect could not be produced without the words, scenery, and stage-action which are its context. In short, it is an effect only obtainable in opera, and in no other way.

The air, the ensemble, and the purely orchestral commentary are, then, instances of the drama yielding to music. But there are no less important moments when the process must be reversed. For the action cannot remain static, which is what usually happens whenever music is allowed to have its way. Here is the central problem of opera, and it has been solved in various ways. The first is the Italian method, by which the opera was frankly divided into recitatives in which the action was carried on, and airs in which the emotional situation is reviewed while the drama stands still. The introduction of ensembles led to the development of a new device, the Finale, in which several characters took part and the whole Act was brought to an exciting climax. It was Mozart who brought the technique of the Finale to perfection. He used voices and orchestra with a consummate artistry to express the entanglement or resolution of a complex intrigue. This was the beginning of the German method of handling opera. It is only a step from the dramatic Finale of Mozart to the continuous 'music-drama' of Wagner, though the development of a very different musical idiom was necessary in order to make it feasible.

In the early German operas, spoken dialogue was used instead of recitative. This is the second main solution of the problem, and it is a solution which has found favour in England. This kind of opera is a play with more or less elaborate songs interspersed between the dramatic scenes. To this class belong Purcell's operas* (except 'Dido and Æneas'), 'The Beggar's Opera' and its numerous progeny, 'The Bohemian Girl,' the Gilbert and Sullivan operas, and modern works like 'Hugh the Drover' and 'The Boatswain's Mate.' In fact, in so far as we can be said to possess a national style of opera at all, it is of this kind, in which music is frankly relegated to those parts of the drama where it is considered suitable, and left out of account altogether when the action can get along without it.

On the face of it this seems to be a sensible way out of the difficulty. But it has one serious disadvantage, which prejudices the method in anything but light comedy. The change from speech to song is too violent, and defeats its own end if it is designed to produce a more natural effect. It also destroys the possibility of giving to an opera the feeling of unity which it should possess no less than a symphony. The Italian method does at least allow for the maintenance throughout the opera of musical tone, so that the adherence to one main tonality varied with excursions into contrasting keys can make its musical and dramatic effect—an effect which plays a very large part in the operas of Mozart and Verdi. The introduction of spoken dialogue between the musical movements makes it impossible for anyone who is not gifted with a very acute and rare sensibility to perceive any such effect in the ballad-opera form, and continuity of musical thought is out of the question. It was no doubt in their desire to escape from this handicap that the two modern composers whose works are mentioned in the list above did not adhere very strictly to the ballad-opera convention, but allowed their operas to become more and more elaborate and symphonic as they proceed. The result is that we are conscious in these delightful pieces not only of the incongruity of the changes between speech and music, but also of a confusion of styles.

While, therefore, the ballad-opera may make a very successful and amusing entertainment, it does appear that it can never produce that sense of completeness which marks a true work of art. It is as though in a picture the main features were painted in oils and elaborately finished, while the intervening passages are sketched in with charcoal. The result may be interesting, and to some extent beautiful, but it does not give us the satisfaction of a final fulfilment of the design.

It remains, therefore, for music to compromise with drama, to take the uttermost farthing in those poetical and reflective passages where its exaction will not impede the movement of the whole, but to give way gracefully where the action must be swift to the extent of appearing intrinsically uninteresting or even, taken by itself, ugly. There is one great and outstanding example of this abnegation by music of its own charms in that long narration by Wotan in the second Act of 'Die Walküre,' which hasty judgment has so often damned for dreary. Consideration (for which it allows, indeed, plenty of time) would reveal to the intelligent hearer not only that Wotan's secret could not be more effectively revealed to Brünnhilde in any other way, but that after the excitements and richness of all that has gone before, a point of repose is very welcome before we proceed to even more violent happenings. A dish of rice-pudding is appetising after a surfeit of plum-pudding and mince-pies.

* It might be more accurate to call these works dramas with incidental music, though the music plays a very important part in their scheme and is, indeed, the sole justification for their revival nowadays.

This, however, is an extreme instance, and Wotan's monologue can also be defended as a perfect expression of the god's tenderness and impotent despair. More often music has to make its contribution with swiftness and point. Here comes in our example from 'Der Rosenkavalier'—Ochs's interruption of the bleating tenor at the Marschallin's levée. This is an instance taken quite at random. But it shows well enough how music can, without putting any brake on movement, give added point to a dramatic effect.

The operatic composer possesses a weapon of extraordinary subtlety and power, since once music, by itself without concrete meaning, is associated with words or actions, it magnifies their emotional power and gives the finest shades to their meaning. That is why many songs by Schubert and Brahms, whose words are little better than the doggerel on a Christmas-card, are none the less great and immortal masterpieces. That is why incredibly silly and ill-written librettos are often redeemed by the music to which they are set. The music provides the poetic quality which is lacking in the words; but conversely, no amount of imagination in the poem can save poor music. That is why, in short, music must be regarded as the more important element in opera.

Although, however, music may redeem a poor libretto, it is obvious that the better the libretto the better the opera is likely to be. The names of da Ponte, of Wagner as poet, of Boito, of von Hofmannsthal are associated with the finest examples of operatic art, in which there is something like perfection in the balance of the two elements. In works like 'The Magic Flute,' 'Fidelio,' 'Faust,' and 'Boris Godounov' we are made only too well aware of the disparity between the composer and his librettist. In the first two of these works the musician lifts us by a mighty effort of his genius into a rarified atmosphere of ideal thought and feeling, which not one man in a million would perceive in the pantomime of Schickaneder or the political melodrama of Bouilly. Gounod's librettists debased a great poetic theme, and the composer certainly did not perform the miracle of elevating it to its original plane, but 'Faust' remains a deservedly popular work; while Moussorgsky's shapeless version of Pushkin's 'dramatic chronicle' is impossible to present entirely in its original form (whatever we may think of Rimsky-Korsakov's drastic revision), and is only saved by his powerful handling of individual scenes. As works of art, all these must be conceded to be less perfect than the operas written by Bizet and Puccini on far less noble themes, though this need not prevent us from preferring imperfect masterpieces to more complete achievements on a lower grade.

The first requirement of the librettist is a broad simplicity of outline—the composer must be responsible for filling in the details of psychology and for subtilising the dramatic action. If you retort that 'Figaro,' 'Otello,' and 'Falstaff' are extremely complicated in their plots, I can only ask you to compare da Ponte with Beaumarchais, and Boito with Shakespeare. It will then be seen that the librettists have produced dramas which are clear and straightforward, with no unnecessary elaboration of incident. Mozart and Verdi restore in a different way the complexity and imaginative invention of the originals. This primary requirement of swiftness in the action and spareness of outline involves a great sacrifice of literary interest, and it must be confessed that there are few librettos which can be read with enjoyment for their own sakes. Indeed I know of only one, which really fulfils this condition—Franc-Nohain's witty 'L'Heure Espagnole,' which Ravel has clothed with music of an equal brilliance.

Literary quality is, then, not of the first importance in a libretto. What is required is a sense of the theatre and a willingness to play into the hands of the composer. If, however, the libretto is not of much account without the music, neither can the music, as I have already pointed out, stand on its own feet. All the skill in characterisation and in clinching a dramatic situation goes for nothing if we do not know what they are about. Ochs's shout of 'Als' Morgengabe!' is nothing but a vehement, senseless, tiresome interruption of a pretty tune, unless we perceive its meaning and comic point. The tune sung by the Italian tenor is itself meaningless and feeble unless we refer it to its context and realise the satirical implication. When we see it performed on the stage all this is so clear and so swiftly apprehended, provided we understand the language, that we give it no conscious thought, but just enjoy the fun. But it is, perhaps, necessary to warn those whose German or Italian is not good that it is well to make a thorough acquaintance with the story of an opera, if not with the libretto, before seeing it for the first time. No complex work of art can be immediately apprehended, especially if one factor in it remains to the end an unknown quantity. After all, if opera is worth the effort of attention, it is surely worth the little extra effort of complete comprehension. This is only to say that opera shares with all the other arts the necessity of a use of their intelligence and an acquisition of some general knowledge on the part of those who experience it. No one who is completely insensitive to words and ignorant of literary movements and conventions can appreciate great poetry, nor will the complete ignoramus get much pleasure or any benefit from a visit to the National Gallery. Yet nine out of ten people who go to the opera have probably never given a moment's thought to the form in general or the work in particular. It is no wonder that some of them find it a dull and unprofitable way of spending an evening.

MUSICAL ART IN SOVIET RUSSIA

By Prof. Eugene Broudo

[Note.—The first part of Prof. Broudo's article deals with the history of Russian music and is, therefore, omitted.—Translator.]

Prior to the European War Russian music depended almost entirely upon the Court. This situation hampered the development of a truly and technically perfected Russian school of composers, and the creation of a reserve of musical performers as well as composers. There was also the absence of a wide base of listeners, which had a double result; on the one hand there appeared a tendency to imitate the musical forms of the West (notice Rubinstein and partly Tchaikovsky), and on the other hand the growing ability to cut loose from the psychology of the ruling classes by such mighty men as Rimsky-Korsakov and the earlier Borodin and Moussorgsky, who, by their social origin, really belonged to the ruling classes. These composers penetrated into the depths of folk-song, which they understood as the musical expression of the collective aspirations of the people. Thus a Western tendency and the populist movement were the elements from which Russian music was developing up to the very time of the October Revolution, and these produced a most unexpected synthesis of form, such as the musical symbolism of Scriabin, or the gay noise of the market-place, as in the music of Stravinsky, or, finally, the daring neo-classicism of Prokofiev. Genetically, these composers came up from the two principal types of Russian musical thought.

On the eve of 1914 the interest in Russian musical art was at its height in the whole of cultural Europe. Moussorgsky, Tchaikovsky, Borodin, Glazounov, Stravinsky, and soon Scriabin, were known to every cultured music-lover in the West. Simultaneously, a group of younger men were coming along, and these played a considerable part in the musical life of Europe and America during the following years because of changed conditions. Rachmaninov and the young Prokofiev may be mentioned. In Russia itself a process of Europeanization was developing. The influence of Wagner and the French symbolists headed by Debussy was particularly and strongly felt. Concert and symphonic literature began to push back opera, which was the only representative form of Russian musical art. Russian musical culture at the fatal year of 1914 was already saturated with the subtle tastes of the West, but without losing its characteristic populist design. The Russian composer nevertheless held on firmly to the traditions of Borodin and Moussorgsky, who by this time had found a new support from the rapidly growing ranks of the Russian bourgeois intellectuals.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AND THE REVOLUTION

The first clash of Russian musical art with the Revolution produced a certain bewilderment among the native composers and performing artists. The Russian musical intellectuals of 1917 had had neither the reserves nor a sufficiently professional solidarity to grip the new and titanic task which opened up before them. The situation roused in them a desire to go abroad, and among those who did so were Rachmaninov, Prokofiev, and Medtner, and also a group of conductors headed by Kussewitzky, the pianists Brovsky and Orlov, and a number of singers beginning with Chaliapin. Stravinsky had left before the Revolution. Some continued to work under Soviet conditions, but both creative and interpretative musical art was greatly weakened. At the same time, however, the demand for music was growing by leaps and bounds. The new audience consisted of millions of workers, Red Army soldiers, and students, and the difficulties of life made no difference to their demands for musical art. They poured into the concert-halls, carrying with them a thirst for new artistic expression. The People's Commissariat for Education satisfied these demands by organized concert-troupes and orchestras, which were scattered over the vast territory of the Soviet Union.

The most difficult problem was to make up programmes which would be intelligible to the new audience, and, although the new public did not at first claim anything definite from the performers, it was soon evident that the old type of programme, which was a hash of popular opera selections, Western classics, and older Russian composers, could not satisfy the healthy appetites of the new audience. A struggle commenced for a new kind of programme, and for a new outlook from the performers. The press and the art organizations called for something which would express the experiences of the Revolution in the form dictated by the rhythm of the new life. At Moscow there was formed an independent Association of Composers which stood upon the basis of Revolution in Art. The chief distributor of this kind of music at present is the Musical Section of the State Publishing House, which attracted not only the work of talented youth, but also composers like Gnessin, Glière, Krien, and others.

During the epoch of Militant Communism all kinds of concerts for the worker and peasant audiences prepared the way for cultural reconstruction. With the improvement of economic conditions the concert life became more decentralised in character. One is able to claim that there now exists an advanced intelligentsia among the workers, who have a real ability to listen systematically to good music. Their demand has created the growth of symphonic orchestras in the larger workers' clubs, beginning with Moscow and penetrating to the provinces. It is significant that the larger workers' clubs are demanding concerts by highly-qualified artists, frequently engaged from abroad. In this latter respect much has been done by the Russian Philharmonic Society, the Leningrad Philharmonic Society, the Odessa Philharmonic Society, and the Moscow Association of Contemporary Music, all these having established contact with the West. 'Persimfans,'* the conductorless orchestra, has also performed foreign music. Some enterprising newspapers have organized special symphonic concerts for their readers.

THE PRESENT SITUATION IN CONCERTS AND OPERA

The musical life of the U.S.S.R. does not fit into any kind of brief formula. In wealth of materials it by no means lags behind the pre-war standard, but there are variations depending upon the general social conditions. The old pre-revolutionary musical taste with its love of brilliant performance still exists, and this spoils the taste of the new audience. Until about last year the interests were staked upon imported artists, who, of course, were frequently great musicians. Recently, however, attention has been given to local artists. Particularly helpful in raising musical culture was the coming of foreign conductors such as Bruno Walter, Klemperer, Weingartner, Kouts [presumably Albert Coates], Stiedri, Monte [? Pierre Monteux], and others, of whom Klemperer, Stiedri, and Kouts produced a deep impression in strengthening the ensemble of our orchestras. This was partly due to their personal talent, but also due to the systematic work done. The first foreign conductor who broke the ring of the blockade in 1921 was Oskar Fried, who conducted a Beethoven cycle at Moscow.

Among orchestras are the now famous 'Persimfans,' which works along the principles of close understanding of all participants in a collective creation, and has no conductor. During five years of existence it has played through orchestral literature from Bach to Honegger. The former Court Orchestra of St. Petersburg has been preserved as the Orchestra of the Academic Philharmonic Society of Leningrad. Similar preservation has been carried out in other cities. Moscow has no permanent symphony orchestra which works with a conductor. It uses for its symphonic purposes the fine orchestra of the Great State Theatre, which is not inferior to the famous Western philharmonic orchestras of Berlin, Vienna, and Amsterdam. In recent times considerable attention has been given to choral ensembles, particularly at Leningrad (the Leningrad Academic Choral Cappella), at Kiev (the State Ukrainian Chorus, 'Dumka'), Tiflis (the Georgian Academic Cappella), and those of other towns. Within the province of chamber music particularly interesting are the three brilliant string quartets named after Glazunov, Stradivarius, and the Moscow State Conservatory, which have developed and became known throughout the country.

THE MUSICAL RÉPERTOIRE

The problem of introducing an old culture to a new audience necessarily influenced the programmes of our orchestral and chamber concerts. At the same time there is a very strong interest in both native and foreign contemporary art [Albert Coates has conducted Holst's 'The Planets' in Soviet Russia.—Translator]. In the U.S.S.R. it is easy for a young composer to obtain performances of his compositions.

Opera experienced the same bewilderment after the Revolution as was observed in other provinces of music. The new forms of society had a tremendous influence upon the life of the Russian opera theatre. The State gave the theatres autonomy, but demanded that they should render a new repertoire, making the theatre a platform for the new social education. All these new demands were pressing hard upon the Russian opera stage, and added to them was the lack of funds. Before the Revolution, opera had held a foremost place in our musical life. The Imperial stage at Leningrad had by 1917 reached undeniably brilliant achievements. True enough, the achievements were of a very subtle nature, and productions like Strauss's 'Elektra' and Stravinsky's 'Nightingale' catered mainly for the highly æsthetic tastes which disappeared during the Revolution. To the new audience who froze in overcoat and overshoes in the unheated auditorium of the theatre during the years of war and the blockade the old opera and ballet were unknown things; but the people followed these with great curiosity and appreciation. The novelty of it stimulated their curiosity. The opera, and even more the ballet, enjoyed an enormous popularity with the masses, as was proved by the insistent efforts of the workers' organizations to secure seats at discount prices.

It is very difficult to tell the story of Russian opera's search for new ways after the Revolution. After some hesitation, the Leningrad Theatre took the lead with a course of contemporary music. 'Distant Bells,' by Schrecker, 'Salome,' by Strauss, 'The Loves of the Three Oranges,' by Prokofiev, were produced, as also were ballets by Stravinsky, and the 'Leap Through the Shadow' by Kshennick. The old æstheticism which was inseparably associated with the sky-blue atmosphere of the Marinski Theatre, with its classical ballet inherited from the Imperial régime, was also revived and technically improved.

The enormous Moscow Theatre, with its sections of the 'New' and the 'Experimental,' moved much more slowly along the new ways. Here prevailed the conservative point of view, which sought to improve and revive the old material of 'Faust,' 'Carmen,' and 'Lohengrin'; and novelties penetrated but slowly. The enormous size of the Moscow opera stage had something to do with the slowness of its development. It could produce but two or three new performances each year. In contradistinction to Leningrad, the Moscow stage made frantic efforts to give a modern reinterpretation of old operas, particularly along the line of staging them with the aid of Western scenic technique. It sought also to change the libretto, but this was not always successful, and was at times even a distinct failure. A particular instance of the latter was the revision of the text of 'Boris Godunov,' which called forth bitter controversy. On the other hand, the Great Theatre was able to maintain a high standard in chorus and orchestra, and some very gorgeous productions were staged.

There are two opera studios of the Moscow Art Theatre, one named after Nemirovich-Danchenko and the other after Stanislavsky. They have become noted features of the national musical life. Both sought to introduce realism into opera, each following its own methods. Particularly well developed in recent times is the work of Stanislavsky's studio. The creator fights against the opera routine. Stanislavsky, by his own system, sought to synthesise the words, the rhythm, and action in a truly creative manner. He demonstrated by his productions of Tchaikovsky's 'Eugene Onegin' and Rimsky-Korsakov's 'The Tsar's Bride' that fine opera can be given with success, despite the absence of 'star' singers.

The greatest difficulties to the producers of opera were caused by the subject matter. It was expected that the theatre should give a vivid reflection of Soviet public opinion. In one way or another the dramatic theatre was able to answer this demand, but the opera has not yet produced any talent able to reflect in music the recent epoch. On the Leningrad and Moscow stages some efforts were made to produce operas with a revolutionary theme, but none of these passed the experimental stage, and at their best were but imitations of an old form with a revolutionary content. Among the more successful may be mentioned the 'Eagle's Revolt,' by the Leningrad composer Pashchenko, and 'The Decembrists,' by Zolotaryeff. The plots of both of these deal with former revolts in Russia.

SUMMING UP

The upheavals of the War and Revolution which re-assessed all values could not, of course, leave the musical creative forces untouched. Within the province of high musical art the Revolution created particularly difficult conditions, and among the noise of the guns the muses were silent. They were silent because there were no printing presses and the composers suffered from want. But now one may point to a number of opera productions as well as to symphonies and concerts which were created within the environment of Soviet actualities. N. Myaskovsky is becoming internationally known as a composer of symphonies. Glière, of Moscow, and the talented Jewish composer Gnessin, are also successful, and Alexander Krein has written a remarkable symphony.

In spite of the fact that the demand was for great monumental work, the subtler type of music is continually being created. N. A. Roslovets considers his creations as the organization of tone-elements independent of any emotional significance.

At Leningrad we find the symphonic composer Shestakovich, who has become very popular, and who in vividness is not behind Prokofiev. Unfortunately, the greatest of contemporary Russian masters, Glazunov, who is over-occupied with his social and pedagogic duties, has been almost altogether silent during the past decade. Silent, too, is the Moscow composer, Ippolitov-Ivanov. Gretchaninov, however, has become known in England and America.

MUSICAL SCIENCE IN SOVIET RUSSIA

Russian musical science is a phenomenon of recent days. It began to develop after the Revolution when the first scientific research institutions of European size were organized. Musico-scientific work developed along three lines: the history of music, the history of folk-lore, and the purely scientific study of musical art. A cause for pride in our musical science is the important experimental work within the province of acoustics, which has given a basis for systematic musical theoretical knowledge. The researches include a serious effort to penetrate the scientific laws for the formation of folk-melody. The invention of Theremin, who obtained sounds by an electric method in space without the aid of touching a musical instrument, gives us an additional cause for pride in our musical science. In Soviet Russia there has also been an increased interest in books on musical subjects. [There are also a number of musical magazines, one or two of them entirely devoted to contemporary music, as would be natural in the new Russia.—Translator.]

NON-MUSICAL FACTORS IN THE APPRECIATION OF MUSIC

By P. E. Vernon

(Strathcona Research Student in Psychology and John Stewart of Rannoch Scholar in Sacred Music at Cambridge University)

Music is generally regarded as essentially something that is heard, and though, admittedly, various factors may occasionally affect appreciation, yet these are thought of as irrelevant and having little bearing on the music itself. I wish to show how many and how important are such factors, music without them being an impossibility. Only when they are taken into account and their musical significance is considered does it become possible to point the way to an adequate theory as to the nature of æsthetic appreciation.

I have been investigating the subject of the appreciation of music and its psychology at Cambridge, using ordinary discussions, questions, introspections, and observations, certain psychological tests, and also two experimental concerts at which members of the audiences (each numbering about fifty people of all degrees of musicianship) tried to write down what they had actually thought about and felt while listening. Previous investigators in this sphere seem to have depended almost entirely on gramophone music, and often appear only to have played bad music to more or less unmusical people; neither the title nor the composer of the music were told to the subjects of such experiments, and an extremely artificial and abnormal situation resulted.* To demonstrate this effect my first concert was as normal as possible, ordinary chamber music, such as a Mozart Trio, 16th-century and Brahms songs, Bach and contemporary pianoforte music, being performed under usual concert conditions by members of the Cambridge University Musical Club. At a second concert the conditions were abnormal, the performers being behind a curtain and the programme announced only in outline, e.g., violin suite, two songs, &c. It consisted of music almost wholly unknown to the audience, especially chosen to throw light on certain points.

Now it would obviously be difficult to write out very complete introspections while listening, hence the following method was developed and proved to be fairly satisfactory, not disturbing appreciation of the music unduly. The introspective records (which were treated confidentially) were on the whole quite good and clear. After each item of music the audience were asked to indicate, individually, how much they had attended to, thought about, or felt certain general categories or headings by giving each 0, 1, 2, or 3 marks according to its relative importance for them in that item. These headings were given in printed directions and explained in a preliminary talk. The audience were required to use only those which seemed to them necessary to summarise all their thoughts and feelings while listening—for example: anything irrelevant to the music—Visual images (mental pictures); Bodily movements and rhythmic responses; Thoughts as to the identity of the music, composers, performers; Interest in other technical aspects of the music; The goodness or badness of the music; Feelings aroused; Æsthetic appeal.

During the rest of each interval (five to ten minutes), or, if it did not distract them, during the music, they amplified their marks by describing as fully as possible any details of their experiences.

The audience were quite serious and interested throughout; at the first concert only 18 per cent. complained at all of the situation; at the second 47 per cent., including all the most musical, admitted to being somewhat distracted, but the majority rather enjoyed being free from performers' mannerisms and the noise of applause. The main difficulty in working out the results was that no two people mean the same thing by æsthetic appeal or value, nor do they estimate their wandering of attention and the like by the same standards. But both the marks, the remarks, and the data obtained by other methods supplemented one another, and it was possible to obtain a good deal of evidence by noting what characteristics were prominent in the more musical subjects of the investigation, what in the less musical. Certain questions with regard to their musical education and other factors were answered at the time, and my personal knowledge of more than three-quarters of them was of the greatest use.

* See, for example, 'The Effects of Music,' edited by M. Schoen. There is, however, in one of the essays in this book, by O. Ortman, a good account of non-musical factors, but their psychological basis and musical significance are not considered.

The first and most obvious non-musical factor is wandering of attention from the music to various associations (recollections of previous performances, and so on) and often to quite irrelevant affairs. To many this free play of the imagination is a source of considerable pleasure, and some people, with but little knowledge of or interest in music, are definitely stimulated to think about extraneous matters by having music going on when not attending. (Tolstoi and Stendhal were presumably of this type.) Analagous is the use of music to help factory workers engaged on monotonous and rhythmic jobs; sailors and savages also often work much better when they sing.

At the concerts the marks for this first category varied with the length of the items, and with their lack of emotional and intellectual interest. I found quite definitely that the more musical, on the average, attend better than the unmusical, for the musician develops a musical sentiment or conscience which debars him from enjoying such lapses, and helps him to concentrate.

The more representational the music the more easily are associations aroused, so that many listeners like to weave emotional dramas into what they hear; any work that attains much popularity is inevitably supplied with a programme, whether the composer intended it or no. In about one-third of the audience either the emotional flux aroused by the music or its physical characteristics may lead on into sporadic visual images, while up to 10 per cent. may enjoy the music because it evokes a continuous kind of dream which they watch as if at a theatre. This phenomenon of visualisation only appears in people with a low degree of mental control, and so increases in frequency with fatigue; it requires a passive, almost hypnotic, state without any critical or objective attitude towards the music. The visual imagery of savages and primitive peoples is very vivid, so that this is probably one of the main effects of music on them; hence the magical powers ascribed to music in the many legends like that of Orpheus. That music is not capable of suggesting specific scenes has often been proved. However, there is some consistency in its effect. For example, in a Polka from Casella's 'Puppazetti,' played as a pianoforte duet, about one-fifth of the audience saw either wooden or foreign soldiers, or a war dance of Red Indian or African natives, and the like (thus combining symbolically the martial, rhythmic, and strange characteristics of the music). Though visualisation is not absent in some people in the most abstract music, yet, together with emotional interpretations, it is naturally most common in songs, opera, and avowed programme music. The more musical, however, often say that when listening to music such as 'L'Après-midi d'un Faune' they may at first visualise scenes or incidents; when they get to know it better they forget the programme and listen to it more abstractly. Some never make use of such associations or interpretations at all. I find that the more musical also have, on the average, a considerable preference for orchestral and chamber music concerts over choral concerts and operas, and show little appreciation of any vocal music. When they do listen to songs they pay but little attention to the words; in fact at the second concert it was demonstrated that an audience of average musical level takes remarkably little notice of the text, for to a song by Campian the following words were sung:

> Now that the sun hath sunk and risen,
> And she the world hath all forgiven,
> Though youth is wanting far and nigh,
> Yet from the embers falls the sky.
> Do not like others when the time
> Seeking their passion from the rime,
> Though without e'er full straightly given
> Fast with a step too slow for heaven.

Actually only 6 per cent. noticed that these words were nonsense; 16 per cent. found them uninteresting, or in some way suspected that they were unusual, or thought them badly enunciated (as a matter of fact they were sung very clearly, but this is a natural psychological reaction to nonsense words); 15 per cent. thought they had attended to the words, but noticed nothing wrong; and the remaining 63 per cent. took no notice of the sense of the words at all.

STUDIES IN EXPRESSION

(From the Musical Courier)

HOW THE CRITIC IS AFFECTED BY

WAGNER STRAUSS CHOPIN BEETHOVEN BACH LISZT SCHUMANN

Music in the Foreign Press

A FRENCH CRITIC ON STRAVINSKY

In the November Nouvelle Revue Musicale Léon Vallas writes:

'If one did not fear being paradoxical, one might aver that Stravinsky is a composer devoid of natural originality, whom his will-power and the circumstances of his wonderfully successful career have compelled to manufacture an artificial originality. He began by being a faithful, docile disciple of his teachers, Rimsky-Korsakov and Glazounov; later he fell under a new yoke, and became, rather than a spontaneous creator, the composer who accomplished the all-powerful volitions of a lord paramount, who always teems with new and contradictory ideas: of Diaghilev, the director of the Russian Ballet. It is in this light that historians will have to study his works if they are to understand the irrational rationale of his evolution. They will then realise the terrible situation of Stravinsky, a composer of the first rank condemned to a kind of everlasting hard labour, and will admire him for having endured the ordeal and maintained himself in the limelight. His story is very similar to his own 'Histoire du Soldat,' to the story of the poor soldier for ever trudging, ever believing he is trudging forwards, and, in order to appear to advance continually, compelled now to mark time, now to walk backwards, making much ado about nothing, discovering things universally known, and beginning afresh, with all the ardour of a neophyte, experiments that have been carried out for centuries and long since given up by others.'

COMPOSERS AND SPANISH FOLK-MUSIC

In the December Musik, Edgar Istel writes:

'To incorporate Spanish folk-music into compositions is a very difficult, almost an impossible, task. What Bizet and Chabrier have done in this respect is very little indeed. The greatest difficulty lies in the harmonization. Glinka was the first to realise the true terms of the problem and to tackle it with a measure of success; but neither he, nor Rimsky-Korsakov, nor even de Falla, has succeeded in mastering the art of putting down on staved paper the egregious chords and peculiar rhythms of Spanish folk-tunes.'

PAUL DE MALEINGREAU

In the November Musica Sacra (Milan), G. L. Centemeri devotes an essay to this Belgian composer (b. 1887, and a pupil of Tinel), praising his music and emphasising its 'Gregorian' character.

VILLA LOBOS

In the December Muzyka (Warsaw), Arthur Rubinstein praises the music of this Brazilian composer for its originality, its genuineness, and its healthy character.

OLD POLISH MUSIC

In the same issue, Henryk Opienski outlines the history of Polish opera, starting from Kamienski's 'Distress Alleviated' (1778). And Hieronim Feicht devotes an article to Polish composers of Church music of the baroque period: Pekiel, Rozycki, Gorczycki, and Zielenski.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Handel's Oratorio, "The Messiah."' By E. C. Bairstow.

'An Introduction to the Music of R. Vaughan Williams.' By A. E. F. Dickinson.

[Oxford University Press, 1*s.* 6*d.* each.]

These two books are the latest numbers in the excellent 'Musical Pilgrim' series. At first sight Handel's oratorio might appear to be a barren subject for a writer to-day. Dr. Bairstow proves it to be the reverse. He is as fresh, enthusiastic, and discriminating as if the work had been a recent revelation to him. Yet he has probably directed as many performances of 'The Messiah' as any other living conductor. His book is the fruit of his experiences, and at the same time shows us how he produces such vital performances of the work. Clearly he doesn't regard 'The Messiah' as something to be gone through periodically for the renewal of the choral society exchequer, nor (in some ways an even worse view) as being in need of gingering up by doubling the pace and playing tricks with the structure. In the matter of additional accompaniments the purists will not be with him, but the well-argued contentions of so practical a musician are not easily set aside. His stimulating little book should be read by all who have to do with performances of the oratorio, from the conductor to the listener in the back row.

Mr. Dickinson uses his space so well that in less than a hundred pages he surveys Vaughan Williams's output down to 'Sancta Civitas.' He has the first qualification for apostolic work of this kind—enthusiasm of the genuine kind that is based on close study of his subject. His Introduction is a well-thought-out consideration of the essential qualities of Vaughan Williams. Few will disagree with any of its conclusions. If Mr. Dickinson is sometimes less convincing in his detailed discussion of the works, we need look no farther than mere taste for an explanation. Thus, he calls the mouth-organ episode in the 'London' Symphony 'sheer tomfoolery,' whereas to many of us it is just the right thing in its place. His estimate of the composer's melodic inventiveness is, we think, too high. Their folk-song origin is often too obvious for originality or for the avoidance of monotony. Bearing on this is a note on p. 27 concerning the Scherzo of the 'Sea' Symphony. Mr. Dickinson says that after his notes on the Symphony were completed his attention was drawn to the fact that:

'. . . when the chorus comes in with the words "laughing and buoyant" the orchestra play, across the triple rhythm of the bar, the first four bars of "The Golden Vanity." Similarly, when the choir sing "surface," on the next page, the orchestra strike up the opening bars of "The Bold Princess Royal," repeating them at p. 67, line 2. They also play the last phrase of the same folk-tune in the second and following bars of line 3.'

One questions the value of allusions so subtle as to escape so keen a student of the score as Mr. Dickinson; could they ever have been detected by a mere listener? But Mr. Dickinson is not abashed. He says, 'The interest of these interpolations is that one would scarcely notice them as such.' But what interest have they save when so noticed? He goes on: 'So completely has Vaughan Williams mastered the secret of 'talking folk-song as to the manner born' that when he writes a particular folk-tune we feel that he might have written it himself.' What an opening he presents here! How came he to overlook an obvious retort? 'So completely, &c. . . . that when he writes an original theme we feel that he is quoting a folk-tune.'

However, it must not be supposed that Mr. Dickinson is a mere blind worshipper. On the contrary. The candour with which he indicates what seem to him to be spots on his sun inspire us with confidence in his judgment in general; and his thoroughness and determination to get to the root of the matter make him a fit commentator on a composer of such uncompromising sincerity as Vaughan Williams. One small complaint: there are numerous music-type examples, but reference to them is not always easy, owing to a want of method in the numbering. There is only one way of doing this sort of thing conveniently, and that is to number all illustrations consecutively from first to last. Mr. Dickinson sometimes uses Roman numerals, sometimes Arabic, and often none at all.

'Konzert und Opern Lexicon,' herausgegeben von Dr. Tobias Norlind. Part 1.

[Stockholm: Klioverlag, km. 3.]

Judging from this first part, the book promises to be a very useful one. It covers orchestral and stage works of all kinds, chamber music (except works for one instrument or for pianoforte and another instrument), and choral music (except a cappella choruses). For each work it gives the dates of composition and publication, often that of the first performance and of revivals, and sometimes a number of particulars—such as, with regard to Bach's works, the instrumental setting and the transfer of music from one work to another. The scheme is carefully carried out. Unavoidably, a few minor mistakes will be discovered here and there, e.g., the vocal score of Lazzari's opera 'Armor' is not mentioned as published, and the date of Blockx's opera 'La Fiancée de la Mer' is given as 1908 instead of the correct 1903 (this is probably a misprint). But as a rule the information given is remarkable for its accuracy.

'Antonin Dvorák.' By Karel Hoffmeister. Translated, with Foreword, by Rosa Newmarch.

[Lane, 6*s*.]

Dr. Hoffmeister begins by telling us he is chiefly concerned with the purely musical characteristics of Dvorák's work, with his invention and the formal and technical side of his art. The book does not live up to that description. There is an adequate biography, containing a number of fresh and characteristic details, but the actual musical criticism is sketchy—a fact that is partly explained by its having originated in a series of lectures. (Not all lecturers have Mr. Colles's art and skill in turning lectures into a good book.) We would not unduly disparage Dr. Hoffmeister's chapters, which are pleasant to read and well calculated to interest anyone who is new to Dvorák; only, considering the author's position and opportunities (he is a professor at Prague Conservatory, where he was a student in Dvorák's time), one is surprised he does not go rather deeper. It is disappointing to come across such an excuse as this (in connection with the Symphony in D minor, Op. 70), 'It is hardly possible to analyse this work here, for an account of its rich and complex structure would be beyond the scope of this book.' Perhaps Mrs. Newmarch will give us an English version one of these days of Sourek's 'Dvorák,' or, better still, a work of her own.

'Ear, Eye, and Hand in Harmony.' By Ernest Fowles.

[Oxford University Press, 5*s*.]

Here is a book where every word is significant. It deals, as its title shows, with the correlation between ear, eye, and hand in the study of harmony, and of course the ear comes first, but not in the usual way.

How shall we begin the teaching of harmony? The author's answer is this: If a stranger goes to an unknown country and has to discover for himself the meaning of the language, his first vocabulary will be the words in most common use. Substitute 'chord' for 'word' and you have the key to the method of starting your study of the unknown language of music.

The scheme laid down in this section is so excellent, and forms such a sound basis for the building up of the subsequent sections (dealing with harmony and the keyboard, harmony and the eye, and harmony and the pen), that it is sketched here as the most useful guide to the method adopted in the whole book.

1. The first step is the Vocal Imitation of Chords. But the student cannot sing chords! No—but he can sing the sounds arpeggio-wise, and hold the chord in his memory as an echo is held, and, in fact, it was a famous echo which gave the author this idea, which is also consistent with his analogy of the spoken language, when the sounds are first learnt by pronouncing them until they are memorised.

And what of those who cannot sing? The author maintains that all who can speak can sing, or, at any rate, hum. This is true, but all cannot pitch sounds correctly, even humming, not because their ear is faulty, but because they cannot control their vocal muscles. And it is the vocal teacher's task to cure the fault.

2. The next step is the recognition of the bass of a chord, by repeating the lowest sound in a plain chord.

3. The octave sense then receives attention, an important and much neglected point. Students sing chords one or two octaves higher or lower than those played.

4. The power of hearing intermediate sounds in a chord follows—this being, in the author's opinion, a most useful stimulus to the harmonic sense.

5. Now comes the first observation of the relation of a chord to a free-moving part below, above, or within the sounds of the actual chord. A short tune is extemporised on a basic harmony, and the students sing, arpeggio-wise, the sounds of the chord.

6. The recognition of the decorative aspect follows, treated in a similar manner.

7. The last of these preparatory stages deals with inversions and the recognition of the fundamental chord.

These first steps are followed by the further stage of recognising concords and discords, decorative passages founded on the chords, the development of the cadence sense, and so on—and all done aurally without any distractions of naming chords, or learning and applying rules!

Space does not allow of our showing the logical way in which the remaining sections develop from this, but enough has been said to show that this new work is a really valuable addition to the literature on the teaching of harmony.

'String Quartet Playing.' By M. D. Herter Norton.

[Birmingham: E. W. Organ, 15*s.*]

The steady growth of amateur string quartet parties is one of the most promising signs of the times. Probably few of the teams realise at the start the difficulties that lie ahead, but it is one of the happiest circumstances in music-making of the ensemble type that the pleasures are so great and cumulative that the participants are undeterred by difficulties that would dishearten the lone student. Too often, unfortunately, many of the difficulties in quartet playing are merely circumvented, mainly because the players are unconscious of the more subtle ones. There has long been need for guidance here. Almost without exception, instruction books have concerned themselves with solo singers and players—not unnaturally. Yet we know that four string soloists getting together for quartet work have a new job to tackle, no matter how great their individual skill. Mr. Herter Norton's book is an excellent guide, enthusiastic in tone and thorough in counsel. His opening words could hardly be bettered:

> 'Chamber music is one of the few lasting interests of life. Young men have grown old together playing for love of it, with a satisfaction that is never dulled, at weekly meetings, year in year out, for a quarter-century or more. Unlike most arts, whose devotees are alone in their pursuit, unlike most sports, which imply some rivalry of skill, chamber music is a social enterprise, the nucleus of sympathetic gatherings wherein the players are dependent upon each other for the achievement of their common interest.'

The main heads are Style, Ensemble, Tempo and Tempo Modification, Phrasing, Dynamics, Colour, and Texture. There are a hundred and thirty-two music-type illustrations, some quite lengthy, the sources ranging from the early classics down to Kodály.

The cost of the book seems heavy, but actually it is low—a mere three and ninepence for each of the party. Not often will they spend that modest sum to such good purpose as in the buying of this admirable guide.

The 'Music Trades Diary, Directory, and Year Book' for 1929 is, as usual, a handy book of reference on a variety of matters—business, professional, legal, &c. (G. D. Ernest, Duke Street, Adelphi, W.C.2. Paper, 2*s*; cloth, 2*s*. 6*d*.)

'Brahms's Lieder.' By Max Friedländer. Translated by C. Leonard Leese.

[Oxford University Press, 10*s*. 6*d*.]

Those Brahmsians who have no German will welcome this book, although the translation (as in so many of our books on music—witness Miss Marshall's recent translation of Kobald's 'Schubert') is not all it might be. In a book of these pretensions it is really absurd to use 'cadenza' for 'cadence' (e.g., p. 106). Friedländer is actually represented as saying that the obbligato in Op. 91 is for violin. The setting of Goethe's 'Phänomen' is said to have been composed in 'in 1833.' Such a phrase as 'the whole is coloured by the warm E major' is hardly English. What is meant is 'the warmth of [i.e., 'fancifully ascribed to'] the key of E major.'

The method of the book is to treat the songs separately (to the extent of the best part of a page, on the average, for each), in the order of their opus numbers. There is a great deal of information which might be hard to come by elsewhere, on the variants in different editions, and also on Brahms's modifications of his poets' texts. The book is one to refer to for facts rather than one to read for literary pleasure, the manner being usually dry and catalogical. A chapter of general æsthetic considerations would have improved it.

L'Elément Flamand dans Beethoven.' By Ernest Closson.

[Bruxelles: Imprimerie Veuve Monnom.]

The Flemish ancestry of Beethoven was established in a book by Raymond Van Aerde, reviewed in the Musical Times of May, 1928. To that work a Preface was contributed by M. Closson, who now pursues the subject to its logical conclusion by showing how this ancestry revealed itself both in Beethoven the man and the composer. Inevitably there is some special pleading, but he makes out a good case, and does it in an interesting manner. As an example of his thoroughness take his opening move:

> 'Un vrai nom flamand, Beet, dans la langue, signifie "betterave"; hoven est une forme de hof—"cour, jardin." Van Beethoven signifie donc "du jardin aux betteraves." Beet existe aussi en allemand et en anglais, dans le sens de "bette" (beta vulgaris) et, en allemand seulement, de "planche" (terme d'horticulture).'

Not many of us have associated Beethoven's name with a beetroot garden! But M. Closson shows that as long ago as 1837 a Dutchman named Van Marsdyk was on the scent, claiming the composer as a compatriot, and arguing ingeniously that if Beethoven had been a German his name would have been 'Von Rubengarten'! M. Closson's strongest evidence in regard to the music is perhaps based on the characteristic humour of Beethoven (which was something quite new in music) and on the rough independence that made his personality a misfit among the well-disciplined folk of Germany and Austria. Nor is it far-fetched to see in the graphic side of so much of Beethoven's music a throw-back to the Flemish school of painting, especially as one of his ancestors (Peter) was a painter, and another (Gerhard) a sculptor. It is, says M. Closson, a Flemish soul which expresses itself in Beethoven, the choice of medium, music, being due to his German mother. And he cites Franck as another example of the son of a race of painters becoming a musician through maternal nationality. (In this connection the strong influence of Beethoven on Franck always strikes us as significant.) M. Closson's interesting book is a considerable addition to Beethoven literature, as it develops fully a subject that has so far been merely touched on.

'The Enjoyment of Music.' By Basil de Selincourt.

[Hogarth Press, 2*s.* 6*d.*]

This is No. 16 of the second series of Hogarth Essays. The author's standpoint is that of the enthusiastic cultivated amateur—a refreshing one for the professional to hit on from time to time. There is much in the matter and manner that the professional feels without being able to express it—certainly not so well as it is expressed here. The author does well to emphasise the importance of doing rather than listening. 'Of all musical pleasures, making music is the best. Music is a dance of the mind, and if many are content to sit out, it is because they have not felt the joy of authentic motion.' This is true, and is the best of answers to those who say that the various forms of mechanised music will kill amateur performance. Nobody who has really grasped the joy of taking part in the making of music will be satisfied with hearing alone, much as he may enjoy it in its place, and as an aid to his own efforts.

'Beethoven's Quartets.' By Joseph de Marliave. Introduction and Notes by Jean Escarra; Preface by Gabriel Fauré. Translated by Hilda Andrews.

[Oxford University Press, 18*s.*]

This painstaking analysis of Beethoven's Quartets was reviewed in the Musical Times on the appearance of the original French edition. It is well translated, but we get very tired of Miss Andrews's italics, particularly 'motif,' a word that recurs scores of times. Marliave was not a profound critic, but he was devoted and laborious. The scale of the analyses can be judged from the fact that there are three hundred and twenty-one quotations in music type. The book will come as a windfall to the authors of programme annotations; and, indeed, as a huge collection of programme annotations it strikes one. The author makes his way conscientiously from page to page of the score, but he keeps his eyes to the ground, and seems oblivious of the poetry of the landscape. Again and again he remarks on the obvious while missing the spirit and the broad view. In its Oxford dress the work is much more handsome in appearance than in Alcan's French edition.

'The Elocutionist's Cyclopædic Handbook.' By C. Egerton Lowe.

[Joseph Williams, 3*s.* 6*d.*; cloth, 5*s.*]

Though primarily for elocution examinees and literary students, this book contains a good deal of interest and value to musicians, especially in the matter of rhythm, the varieties of rhythmic feet being fully explained. There is a fine store of miscellaneous literary knowledge here, from Metre to Malapropism and Syllepsis to Spoonerism, with tips concerning breathing, speaking, stuttering, and all manner of things elocutionists should do or eschew.

'The Very Thing. Read-out-able Rhymes for Children.' By ffrida Wolfe.

[Sidgwick & Jackson, 6*s.*]

Mrs. Wolfe has the knack in an unusual degree. It is long since we have struck so good a book of verse for children—pretty fancies, neatly turned, with a quaint twist of humour, and a genuine insight into the mind of the youngsters. The woodcuts by Elizabeth Rivers are no less just right, and help to make the work true to its title—the very thing for a gift book.

The latest number of the Mayfair Biographies is 'Bach,' by Eric Blom—a skilful piece of concision, with a well-produced portrait, facsimiles of music autographs and other illustrations, a list of works, and bibliography (Murdoch, 1*s.* 6*d.*).

SONGS

Some excellent reprints come with this month's music. One of the best anthologies I have seen is the 'Elisabeth Schumann Song-Book,' a publication in the Universal Edition, obtainable from Chester. Beginning with J. S. Bach, and ending with Strauss and Wolf, the volume includes examples of all the great German song-writers and is a treasure-house to the high-voiced singer. To the student it forms a splendid summary of the development of the song, and lecturers on this subject will find it a compact and useful source of examples. The volume is an extraordinary piece of value for money, and, musically, one has nothing but praise for it; but some of the translations are not up to standard—singers with a sense of the ridiculous will have difficulty with several of the English versions, and it would be a great gain if the publication were improved in this respect. One very interesting feature is that phrasing and breath-marks are printed which were put in Elisabeth Schumann's copies of his songs by Strauss himself.

From Stainer & Bell come a set of eight songs from Handel's operas arranged, and well arranged, by G. F. Crowder. The accompaniments are neat and clear and not overdone, and the figuring is shown. The songs are for high voice. 'Falsa Immagine,' the first one, must be very little known and is specially beautiful. To J. M. Diack's series of Handel songs are added five numbers, including a brilliant soprano 'Praise the Lord,' from 'Esther,' which is very reminiscent in its opening passages of the Overture to 'Acis.' Patersons are the publishers.

An attractive tune by Lully (no more detailed source is given) is arranged by Helen Fothergill and published by Stainer & Bell. The Molière words are well done in English by Georgina Tanner.

Next comes an album of Mendelssohn songs, edited by Sydney Northcote and published by Elkin. Mendelssohn was curiously untouched by the great developments in song-writing that were taking place in his day, and his attitude to his words is strangely detached. But how good the music is at its best! The 'Hunting Song' ('Jagdlied') is a splendid little work, full of rhythm and unaffected high spirits.

A good venture is Paxtons' issue of twelve of the best-known Brahms songs in a single volume at the low price of two shillings. The print is clear, if small, and no one will feel disposed to quarrel with a publisher who gives him such things as 'Minnelied,' 'Feldeinsamkeit,' 'Die Mainacht,' and these others at twopence apiece.

From the point of view of new music this month is rather disappointing. Probably the best thing is T. F. Dunhill's quiet and thoughtful setting of 'The Holy Babe.' The song has a generous flowing tune, and a well-managed climax makes an effective ending. Stainer & Bell publish it, and also Alec Rowley's 'Dream Village.' Edgar Barratt's 'Beauty' has that lusciousness and obvious emotional effect that its composer understood so well, but does little service in any real sense to Masefield's poem. It deals with the more obvious qualities and misses the important ones. Elkins are the publishers. From the same house are Cecil Baumer's two songs, 'At Eventide' and 'Out on the downs,' frankly conventional in style, though well written and effective.

A piece of very neat handling is Alfred Reynolds's setting of Goldsmith's 'When shall I marry me?' The song is tuneful and very lively in rhythm and texture; it comes off well, and will be a useful addition to the song-list of the rather light mezzo-soprano. M. van Someren-Godfery sets 'Fear no more the heat of the sun' with restraint and dignity, and the words have due effect (Elkin). The song is more telling than the same composer's over-elaborate 'The King of China's Daughter' (Augener). Miss Sitwell's poem is as light as can be, and this rather ponderous treatment crushes it. Again over-elaborate is 'Go, teach the swan to swim' (Augener): but if careful treatment can steady down a rather fussy accompaniment, this song has point.

Edgar L. Bainton sets Spenser's 'In praise of Cynthia.' The song avoids the commonplace rather too deliberately, I feel. It is skilfully written, and has many good points, but in the setting of so fresh a poem as this, even a touch of self-consciousness is out of place. Novellos publish it.

It is difficult to know what to say about Jacques Wolfe's 'Three Negro Poems.' Clement Wood's verses are something like those of Vachel Lindsay, though not so good. They are a kind of 'spiritual,' and the composer relies on the cumulative effect of snappy rhythms. The music is jazzed-up, restless stuff. It is probably sincere, and a good deal of thought has gone to its making, but after all the fuss one finds none of the qualities that have made music in the past. There is essential triviality and absolute lack of restraint.

Edition Matatani, an East India publisher, sends three works by Paul J. Seelig. The basic style is essentially European; in all these songs, however, there is an element of extraneous foreign colouring due to the use of unusual scales and rhythms. Although the music is often picturesque and effective, I doubt if it goes at all deep. I should think it is about as Malay as 'Hiawatha' is Red Indian—and perhaps not so much so in any true sense. But some of the songs, the two entitled 'Kupu-Kupu,' for instance, have vitality. There is a good deal of atmosphere again in 'Dandang gula miring' in the set 'Tembang Sunda.' The composer has technique and an obvious grip of his material, and, judging from the catalogue of his works, has made a special study of the music of Java and Malay. It is open to doubt, however, whether any good can come of this grafting of native melodies on a style-basis that is obviously European.

Maurice Senart sends a number of songs by Reginald C. Robbins, who sets the great passages of English poetry to music of high intention and serious aim. And he has imaginative power, as can be seen from the opening of 'Aftermath.' Even so the songs are not successful as a whole, partly because the composer's accompaniments too rigidly follow the rhythm of the voice part, partly because, by concentrating on details at the expense of the whole song, the writer achieves only formlessness. There are 'moments of vision' behind this elaborate music, but the expression is not clear enough or certain enough for the listener to be able to share them. T. A.

PIANOFORTE

Schirmers send two more numbers of Aurelio Giorni's 'Twenty-four Concert Etudes.' These studies, like the earlier ones, are fluent and effective, but not very personal or striking in content. Enrico Bossi's 'Soldiers marching' is telling music, suggestive enough with its drumming figure, and well developed, altogether above the average of this sort of music. William Heilman's 'Dusting the keys' is mere fooling; a study, perhaps, in the technique of the jazz-player, not very cleverly written and quite without value. It has not even the interest of the better-known 'Kitten on the keys,' from which it is obviously derived. Lee Pattison's 'Two Florentine Sketches' have atmosphere, and are written with a knowledge of pianoforte effect. 'Morning songs on the Arno,' in particular, is fresh and picturesque.

From Elkin comes Elgar's 'Beau Brummel' Minuet, arranged for pianoforte. It is simple and unpretentious, and quite typical of its composer's lighter moments in the gesture of its tunes and the methods of handling. Norman O'Neill's 'Three Sketches' are simple, but well-turned, and with an occasional distinction of phrase. The second number is probably the best of the three. David Stephen's No. 6 of 'Six Moods' (Oxford University Press) is a well-planned little piece, thoughtful in style and with a certain astringency of outlook. It allows itself no facile effects, and as one gets to know it better one appreciates the thought that lies behind its restrained manner.

From Edition Matatani (Java) is a set of three Javanese Dances by Paul J. Seelig. Like the composer's songs, noticed above, these works are essays in the use of native material by a composer of fluent technique who obviously thinks in terms of European music. T. A.

UNISON

Dr. Harold Watts sets Fletcher's 'In Praise of Pan' with seemly jollity. Lusty freedom, and a well-curved phrase, are needed to make the song go well. A delicate bloom on the tone befits Chastey Hector's 'Lullaby.' It could be sung by quite small children. The composer suggests that certain phrases might be sung as solos (Elkin).

Maurice Jacobson's 'The Robin' is a chirpy, diminutive ditty, for smaller children. A group of semiquavers near the end provides a neat little exercise. Walter Adrian writes both words and music of 'Perseverance.' Neither is at all fresh, but the cheery vigour of the thing will please (Cramer).

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

Julius Harrison, general editor of the new Winthrop Rogers edition of Choral Music for Festivals, has arranged for S.S. 'Willie, prithee go to bed' (from 'Deuteromelia'), and for S.S.A., 'The Violet,' from Scarlatti's music. The first is sweetly ingenuous, with a happy, lilting 'fa la la' refrain—capital practice in delicacy and precision at speed; the second has the grace and fragrance of the flower. Youngish choirs will be glad to work at it, and will find much to do them good, whilst those of greater experience will enjoy it as a piece that allows them to concentrate on tone-colour and phrase-shaping (Rogers: Hawkes).

'Fiddle and Drum' is Alfred Moffat's arrangement for S.S. of an Italian peasant air, played on the bagpipe. There is good fun in the rhythmic life of the tune, and opportunity for the use of varieties of (mostly) loud tone (Novello).

A Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis for women's or boys' voices (S.S.A.) will be welcome in small choirs. Dr. Emily Daymond writes simply, with a fit feeling for the text, and is likely to hold the interest of intelligent singers. The alto part merely touches low G a few times, and F once (though this can be avoided by taking the upper octave) (Year Book Press).

E. L. Bainton's 'Sirena' (S.S.) is a setting of the words by Michael Drayton that most people know in Stanford's song. Bainton uses light interplay of the parts, charming phrase-curves, and delicate nuances, in this most attractive piece (Elkin).

Paul Edmonds's 'The earth loveth the Spring' has words by Dr. Bridges. His use of many repeated notes is probably intended to give a sense of classic poise. It is not, on paper, very attractive, though fine tone-quality might give it atmosphere. It is for S.S.A. The same composer's 'Follow me, follow' (words from the same source) is for S. solo (or semi-chorus), S.A. This has a bright, clear ring, but there is nothing for words save the repetition of the title, and 'Follow, we follow'—only that and 'come,' for variety. This is, textually, the most economical part-song I ever saw, with the possible exception of 'King Charles he was . . .' (Cramer).

MALE-VOICE

S. E. Lovatt's arrangement of 'Richard of Taunton Dene' is for T.T.BAR.B., and is the kind of thing that many choirs enjoy. Most of these folk-song arrangements that run to any length (this has sixteen pages) have too little variety in their unity. When there is variety it is too much of the 'Harmonious Blacksmith' kind, with little subtlety and sense of organic growth. I believe much more might be made of vocal variation form if the right men were to tackle it (Williams). Bryceson Treharne's version of the shanty, 'Roll the cotton down,' for T.T.B.B., with solo for tenor or high baritone, is a hearty affair, in which a good pianist is needed. The chorus part does not make great demands, and is kept deliberately a good deal in a groove. The effect is worth while (Schirmer: Hawkes).

'If I had but two little wings' (Bainton, for T.T.B.B.) needs a light spirit. Coleridge's words, pleasantly ingenuous, are set with real grace and distinction (Elkin).

Dr. Thomas Wood has made, for T.T.BAR.B., a brisk and brilliant setting of what is called an 'Early Morning Meadow Song (Rum and Milk).' In this delectable liquor the poet drinks to the dairymaids. A rollicking affair, needing address and (if you can get them) some top C's. The composer considerately says these can be omitted 'if they are considered extravagant by either the conductor or the tenors.' If courage for the high C's is low, I suggest an application of the Dutch variety mentioned in the sub-title of the song (Stainer & Bell).

One of Thomas Dunhill's artistic arrangements is 'Farewell, Manchester,' for T.T.B.B. This is simple and gentle. Its loyal sentiments ought to be learnt by all inhabitants of that 'noble town,' as the song calls it. Some of them would, perhaps, be very glad to sing it (Novello).

MIXED VOICES

A prettily-flowing song, with a good deal of varied treatment in a short space, is Julius Harrison's S.A.T.B. arrangement of 'Come o'er the bourn,' the melody of which is about four hundred years old. It will exemplify many graces of part-song singing, and please any choir that likes swinging a tune about. Greville Cooke's music to 'Oh! hush thee my baby' (Kipling's words), has interestingly-woven parts, and a striking chromatic touch here and there that gives it distinction. The same composer sets two extracts from Browning, 'Oh, to be in England' and 'How can I help England?' both in broad style. In the second song care is needed to avoid too even stressing of the eight crotchets in the bar. Both pieces are marked to be sung rubato; conductors will enjoy working out that element. There is some division of the parts in the first, and a few chords in five parts in the second. 'Claribel' (Tennyson's poem), is a third song by Mr. Cooke. Here there is much opportunity for the appropriate use of tone-colour for the various descriptive lines —'the wild bee hummeth,' 'the babbling runnel crispeth, the hollow grot replieth,' and so on. All these are for S.A.T.B. (Hawkes).

Rutland Boughton has arranged for S.A.T.B., with orchestra or organ (two stave accompaniment), Schubert's 'The Great Hallelujah,' a massive and uplifting piece that Church choirs, as well as choral societies, should look at. It needs a good bass line, so that the organist need not rely on his pedals alone (Williams).

The first motet in Brahms's Op. 74, 'Wherefore now hath life,' is also suitable for concert or church performance by a six-part choir (S.S.A.T.B.B.). It is particularly good for some special occasion when a short cantata is in order, and of its four sections, one or more may be sung separately as a shorter anthem. First there is a fine grave chorus for S.A.T.B. only, which, with the last section, should be noted by choirs that cannot afford the six parts demanded by the second and third movements. The sombre tone of the words need not deter any, for the answer to the doubts they imply is given later. The second chorus (using the six parts) is a very short, jubilant exhortation to praise, and the third brings consolation and hope, in noble music. Lastly, there is a chorale, expressing the Christian belief that 'Seen in God's light death looks kind, A journey, not an ending.' This motet should be in the repertory of all good choirs (Novello).

Two songs with old words are Chastey Hector's straightforwardly vivacious setting of 'Here 's a health unto His Majesty' and Edgar Bainton's 'A Merry Meeting,' both for unaccompanied four-part choir. The latter is in ballet style (to 16th-century words, with 'fa la las' interspersed). It goes at a very lively pace, and is a happy bit of work (Elkin).

From Stainer & Bell come three cantatas. Dr. Thomas Wood's 'The Ballad of Hampstead Heath' (2*s.*) is a spirited 'fantasy' for chorus (S.A.T.B.) and orchestra, a clever counterpart of J. Elroy Flecker's poem about the descent to earth of Bacchus and his crew, and how London took the visitation. The music is not particularly difficult; it requires flexibility and a sense of fun and characterisation. The scoring is so arranged that choirs unable to command a full orchestra (for which parts are available) can perform it with strings, pianoforte, wood-wind quintet (two flutes), two horns, two trumpets or cornets, and two trombones, with drums ad lib. There is a third scoring, which does without the wood-wind. This attractive work lasts about fourteen minutes.

Herbert Howells's 'Sir Patrick Spens' (3*s.*) is for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra. Here also are alternative scorings, one for full orchestra and the other for 'strings, some wood-wind, three or four brass instruments, and pianoforte.' In one place the women's voices are in six parts, and near the end ten parts are written for. The music has strength, and some subtle solo work adds to its attractiveness. A resourceful choir will expend its capacity with satisfaction here.

T. H. Croxall's 'Dusk to Day' (2*s.*) is a setting of four poems by 'A. E.' The first, 'Dusk,' and the last, 'Day,' are for chorus only (S.A.T.B.). The second, 'Night,' is for baritone solo with chorus, and the third, 'Dawn,' is a duet for soprano and baritone. The scoring is for strings and pianoforte, with single wood-wind, two horns, trumpet, and drums. It is so arranged as to sound complete if any of the wind is absent. There are a few bars of doubled parts near the end. The music has imagination, and moves with chromatic freedom. It could be sung by a fairly small choir of fair experience, which would find in it interesting material for study and for the exercise of its richest tone. W. R. A.

CHAMBER MUSIC

There seems to be a rising market for violin duets. On the one hand the warfare a virtuoso waged against another in the past century seems to have abated to a considerable extent, and Greek meets Greek more frequently now, and often in a spirit of comradeship. On the other, composers, tired of muted trumpets and slithering trombones, are looking to old and forgotten combinations for new ideas, and some of them have re-discovered the violin duet. There should then be a fair number of performers interested in the Nine Fantasies for two viols of Thomas Morley which Dr. E. H. Fellowes has adapted for two violins (Stainer & Bell). The Nine Fantasies represent impressions unconnected by any central theme and idea; the first is entitled 'The Sorrowful One'; No. 2 (not so aptly), 'The Catherine Wheel'; No. 3, 'The Swallow,' and so on. They represent also a minimum of technical difficulty (not one rises above the third position), and a maximum of enjoyment for the players. The violinist who derives no pleasure from the marvellous ingenuity of the writing will never know what music means. Incidentally, the contrapuntal form and the consequent need for vigorous rhythm should act as a tonic on students whose rhythmical disposition is languid.

Jeffrey Mark's 'Scottish Suite' for violins and orchestra (Carnegie Collection of British Music) had best be considered as chamber music rather than orchestral music. Violins alone do not constitute an orchestra, and the composer himself tells us that if less than twelve players are available the work should be regarded as a piece of chamber music for four solo violins and pianoforte. To write for four violins is a task of some difficulty, and the only works of the kind I know are the two short pieces of Hellmesberger's and a thing of Leonard. Yet the combination has not a few possibilities which, ably exploited, should provide very effective music. Unfortunately, the composer of the 'Scottish Suite' seems bent on giving a modern colour to his thoughts rather than on studying features specially adapted to the genius of the instrument, or even the careful distribution of the parts. In any age but the present some bars would be ascribed to the printer's fancy. Since all laws have been abolished we have no right to assume outside interference.

A Trio for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte by Gustav Strube (G. Schirmer) is a more hopeful work. The composer, like so many of his confrères, has also been attacked by the bacillus hodiernus, which is a pity, for his musical ideas, fresh and interesting, are just the kind which can be most lucidly put in the idiom of the pre-Schönberg era. But the attack is not a serious one. The symptoms are slight, and do not affect to any important extent the even tenor of his music. There is no indication of any sort in the cadenza which opens the second movement. A friendly hint, such as 'cadenza,' or 'ad lib.,' or 'in strict rhythm,' would help those who read it for the first time.

VIOLONCELLO

William Clifford Heilman's 'Suite of Dances' (Schirmer) for violoncello and pianoforte consists of three dances more akin to the typical morceau de salon than to dance music. Indeed, the second, entitled Intermezzo, recalls a salient passage in Richard Strauss's opera, 'Helen in Egypt.' But this does not detract in the least from the merits of Heilman's work, which in the main is modest, melodious, and pleasing enough. The 'Romance' by C. F. Abel for violoncello and pianoforte, adapted and arranged by Alfred Moffat (Augener), is a degree better than this, if for no other reason than that the times in which Abel wrote knew not the disturbing influences we experience at the present moment, and his work has thus a directness and solidity not to be looked for in modern music. Abel was, as perhaps will be remembered, a pupil of John Sebastian, and in turning from Abel's 'Romance' to his master's 'Slumber Song,' arranged by Harvey Grace (Oxford University Press), we go from better to best. This piece has been already noticed in its violin arrangement last month, and I need only to add that it promises to be just as useful and effective on the 'cello as it is on the violin.

STRING ORCHESTRA

A number of arrangements for string orchestras have been published during the past month which undoubtedly owe their being to the competition festival. James Brown's 'Polychordia String Library' has been enriched by a Serenade, 'To Mirande,' by Felix White, and by a Suite of Old English melodies collected under the title of 'From Tudor Times,' arranged by Thomas F. Dunhill (Stainer & Bell), edited, fingered, and bowed by James Brown. At the same time the Year Book Press brings out a Minuet and Bourrée arranged for strings and solo pianoforte by Emily Daymond from Handel's Organ Concertos in G minor and B flat. All these are excellent things which will answer well the purpose for which they have been written. I will be bold enough, however, to call attention to the danger of giving too prominent a part to the double-basses. On p. 3 of the Handel arrangement, for instance, I find the part of the 'celli which moves in crotchets reinforced by the double-bass on the first beat of the bar. This is an Allegretto in 3-4 time, and can only cheapen the lilt and weigh down the structure. I have a deep respect for Percy E. Fletcher's orchestral arrangements and an equally deep admiration for Coleridge-Taylor's 'Negro Melodies,' but the condensed scores (pianoforte conductor) are a little too reticent to give me a clear idea of their value. I have no doubt, however, that 'Deep River,' 'I'm troubled in mind,' and 'Sometimes I feel like a motherless child' (Hawkes) have met in Mr. Fletcher the transcriber they deserve.

CHURCH MUSIC

Some excellent examples of modern English Church music come from Stainer & Bell. Good choirs will find ample scope in the Te Deum and Benedictus in A (issued separately), by Albert C. Tysoe. This is strong, broadly-written music, very effective vocally, and with an interesting, well-developed accompaniment which gives opportunities for the use of a tuba. A setting by Charles Wood of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in the key of G would suit the average Church choir. It is founded on an old Scotch chant, and is quite straightforward and easy to sing. In bar 8, p. 3, an F is missing from the organ part. Choirs looking for a new cantata might examine Frederic H. Wood's 'The Coming of Christ.' It may be sung at the season of Advent or at any other time. It is for tenor and bass soli and chorus, with accompaniment for organ, pianoforte, or full orchestra. It is divided into four parts—The First Coming, The Second Coming, The Tribulation, The Kingdom—each of which may be used as a separate anthem, or each of the larger choruses as a shorter anthem. The choruses are concise, skilfully-written movements, and there is some effective work for the solo voices. The length of performance is from twenty to twenty-five minutes. The same composer's setting of the Lord's Prayer for use in schools is devotional and well suited for its purpose.

Harold E. Darke's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, in A minor (Cramer), is fresh and unconventional. It is intended to be sung unaccompanied and in free rhythm. Numerous phrases are allotted to a solo voice, and in one verse the choir divides. The music—modal in character and freely treated in the modern manner with strings of fifths and occasional unexpected harmonic touches—will not appeal to everybody. It is purely a matter of taste, and one can only advise choirmasters to write for a copy and judge for themselves.

Gramophone Notes

By 'Discus'

H.M.V.

The late arrival of the January records limits me to brief comment—a pity, because there are several recordings of unusual interest and excellence.

Hard on the heels of the Columbia fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky comes a recording of the work at the hands of the New Symphony Orchestra under Sir Landon Ronald. The only fault is the over-keenness of the string tone in loud passages. This fault is admittedly common to electrical recording, but I find it more than usually pronounced at several points here. On the credit side are some superb climaxes, especially in the Finale. No one can fairly ask for more vivid playing and recording than are in this set as a whole (D1511-16).

This last remark applies also to 'Petroushka,' played by the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Albert Coates. Music of this kind never loses under Coates, and there is all the fire and colour we expect. I dislike, however, the frequent effect of a hollow echo (D1521-24).

The palm for orchestral recording this month goes to that of Elgar's Violoncello Concerto, played by Beatrice Harrison and the New Symphony Orchestra, with the composer conducting. Here we have not only the climaxes that are common in present-day records, but the nuance and subtlety that this exquisite work demands. Note, for example, the Allegro molto—actually a scherzo—wherein not a point in the delicately-coloured scoring seems to be missed. One of these—a chromatic scale descent, pp, by the wood-wind, is so delicious that I simply had to put the needle back and hear it again. The Elgarian will treasure this set of records. I doubt if the gramophone has ever before done such a full measure of justice to the composer (D1507-09).

An attractive Wagner record is that of the Spinning Chorus from 'The Flying Dutchman' and Florence Austral at her best in Senta's Ballad, with the chorus and orchestra of Covent Garden, conducted by John Barbirolli (D1517).

Critics will differ widely concerning the record of Dr. Schweitzer playing the 'little' E minor Prelude and Fugue of Bach. All is clear, and the organ (Queen's Hall) records excellently; but the pace (especially of the Fugue) is far too slow for my taste. Those who like their Bach this way will call it dignified; my word is funereal.

The mid-month batch gives us another U.S.A. orchestral record—the San Francisco Symphony, conducted by Alfred Hertz, in Gounod's 'Funeral March of a Marionette' and Schubert's D major 'Marche Militaire.' We have had an overdose of the latter; Gounod's little joke comes off well, and remains one of the very best examples of musical humour (D1286).

Haydn's Violoncello Concerto in D, with Suggia as soloist, is a vintage that needs no bush. The conductor is John Barbirolli (D1518-20).

Cortot is recorded in 'The Harmonious Blacksmith' and Chopin's Berceuse—beautiful playing, of course, and less beautiful tone, also of course (DB1145).

It is good to find Cyril Scott making records of some of his earlier works—'Danse Negre' and 'Rainbow Trout.' I have an impression, though, that both (especially the 'Danse Negre') need more power variety (2895).

Fine fiddling is that of Samuel Dushkin in a couple of Albeniz pieces (E523).

There are three vocal records: Elsie Suddaby in Schubert's 'Faith in Spring' and 'Cradle Song'—better in the latter, but with unclear words in both (B2875); M. Panzera in Duparc's 'Chanson Triste' and Fauré's 'Claire de lune,' with orchestral accompaniment—expressive singing, this (E519); and Peter Dawson in Martin Shaw's 'Cargoes' and Bantock's 'Captain Harry Morgan'—fine, telling voice and style, with exemplary diction (B2884).

BRUNSWICK

Every time I hear the fourth Symphony of Dvorák I find myself wondering at the rarity of its performance. It possesses all the qualities that are supposed to ensure popularity—reasonable length, tunefulness, and a bright and attractive style. The Brunswick Company has done well to record it, and so make us independent of the concert-givers, who seem to think that of Dvorák's Symphonies only the 'New World' is worth frequent hearing. These records are excellent, and the playing of the orchestra under Basil Cameron leaves hardly an opening for complaint (30125-28).

The two records of Corelli's 'Christmas Concerto,' played by the London Chamber Orchestra, also call for praise. Perhaps the style is a bit too full-bodied for a work which belongs to the chamber-music family rather than to the orchestral. But everything is beautifully clear. The final Pastorale is a delight. Anthony Bernard conducts (10265-66).

Chamber music records are now so uniformly excellent that there is little room for detailed criticism. The only cause for complaint is in the lack of enterprise shown in the choice of work. Here, for example, is the admirable Brosa Quartet playing the familiar D major of Mozart—a work which was recently done by (I think) the Flonzaley players. When one considers the great number of quartets by Haydn and Mozart, one questions the soundness of this policy of limited choice. Classical chamber music is now more popular than it has ever been, and the gramophone public is ready to extend its acquaintance far beyond the little handful of established favourites. The Brosa performance only lacks a touch of sparkle to make it first-rate (30133-34).

One of the very best of the month's vocal records is that of young Frederick Firth, a treble who is, I think, at least the equal of Thomas Lough. I don't like his songs—Gounod's 'There is a green hill' and Liddle's 'Abide with me.' It says much for Frederick that he makes them sound less weak than they really are. I look forward to hearing this gifted boy again, and often (20073).

A baritone new to me is Gregory Stroud. He sings Graham Peel's 'In Summer-time on Bredon' and Lehmann's 'The Rancher's Daughter,' with a pleasant musical voice and expressive style. His words come through well, too. He promises to be an accession to the gramophone (10267).

A record of Maurice Schwartz in Yiddish makes me regret that so far I have failed to acquire that tongue. His 'Drunken Cantor,' however, is amusing even to those who don't understand a word of it. He has a fine voice, full of variety. This is an unusual record (45006).

Dance music is a strong suit in this month's output; I have no space for details.

COLUMBIA

By way of aftermath of the Schubert competition come records of the two English works that shared a prize—'Two movements in symphonic form' (completing the 'Unfinished'), by Frank Merrick; and 'Pax Vobiscum,' by J. St. A. Johnson. Mr. Merrick's pieces are so obviously designed to sound like Schubert that it would be absurd to complain of their lack of originality. The Scherzo recalls especially the Minuet from the G major Pianoforte Sonata; the Finale is attractive, but I feel that the worked-up ending is not in keeping with the rest of the movement. In both pieces the bright, clear scoring is a feature; and the excellence of the recording is, no doubt, largely due to it (9662-63). 'Pax Vobiscum' pleases me less. The texture seems rather turgid, and the sentiment and style generally might well have been cleaner. To be reminiscent seems to be the fate of the Schubert competition pieces; the main theme of 'Pax Vobiscum' is very like the opening strain of 'The last rose of summer.' These works are played by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted anonymously (9564).

We have heard so much about Schumann's inability to orchestrate and to work in the larger forms that we take up one of his Symphonies with misgiving. His No. 4, in D minor, has just been recorded, played by the Mozart Festival Orchestra (Paris), under Bruno Walter. It proves to be so attractive throughout that the 'come-back' of Schumann may not, after all, be limited to his chamber music and pianoforte works. Only the vagaries of fashion could have kept so good a symphony from the concert-room, and solid merit should bring it back again (L2209-12).

A pianist new to gramophonists (I fancy) is Robert Lortat. If this is his debut, he makes it in no uncertain fashion with a fine performance of Chopin's Twenty-four Preludes. He is specially good where pace and passion are called for—in fact, his facility is almost a snare at times; a trifle less of speed would have improved the effect in some passages. And I can't bring myself to feel that the B flat major Prelude ought to be so quick and excited as it is made here. But all in all, this is a splendid set of performances, deserving of far better tone than the recording gives them (9568-69).

First-rate playing, too (and almost first-rate recording), is that of Myra Hess in her arrangement of Bach's 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring,' and the Gigue from the G major 'French' Suite (D1635). (The bulletin, by the way, describes the former as a Chorale Prelude, and says that it was written for organ, whereas it is a vocal number in a Church Cantata.)

As a rule I have not been convinced by Lionel Tertis's choice of material for transcription into viola solos. But he has made a good shot with Handel's Violin Sonata in F, from which he has taken the Adagio non tanto and the Allegro. The result is first-rate, the broad Adagio suiting the viola to perfection (L2213).

Not since early boyhood have I heard Jackson's Te Deum in F, and I thought never to hear it again. Presumably it is still sung in churches, or the Sheffield Choir would hardly have recorded it. It is desperately poor stuff, and Sir Henry Coward and his singers ought not to waste themselves on it. They are better employed (and they sing far better, too) in the companion piece, Clarke-Whitfeld's 'I will lift up mine eyes' (9573).

METROPOLE

There is an improved standard here in several ways, and I am glad to note that the Company no longer mixes its material in the capricious and unpractical way I complained about some months ago. The two sides of a disc now give us the same performer and the same type of work.

Musically, there is little of importance recorded, but the light fare is good and generally well reproduced. All the following are good value: The Frascati Orchestra in a transcription of Paderewski's Minuet in G and a piece that I do not know and cannot name, because the Minuet label is attached to both sides (1102); the band of the 'A' Division of the Metropolitan Police in a Nautical Selection and the 'Raymond' Overture—both mercilessly truncated (1083); Leonardo Kemp and the Piccadilly Hotel Orchestra in arrangements—Woodforde-Finden's 'Kashmiri Song' and Grieg's 'Ich liebe dich' (1101), and the Intermezzo from 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and Schubert's Serenade—not well together in the latter, the band being unable to cope with the soloist's very pronounced rubato (1091); the same performers are better in 'Down in the Forest' and Easthope Martin's 'Evensong' (1110).

Vocal records include some manly singing by Joseph Farrington in 'Off to Philadelphia' (which is labelled as being arranged by Battison Haynes, whereas it was composed by him) and German's 'The Yeomen of England' (1094); and Tom Kinniburgh in Campbell's rather tame 'March of the Cameron Men' and Cowen's capital 'Border Ballad' (1109). These songs are all accompanied by orchestra, and the singers' diction is exemplary.

Megan Telini sings a couple of attractive Welsh songs in their proper tongue. She has a bright and telling voice (1036). From Wales we go across the other border with a record of Tom Frame in an amusing recitation, 'Tam Mactartan, a true story of the Saucy Mary Ann,' and a monologue labelled 'Scottish Humour'—which happens to be the less amusing of the two, perhaps because it is too much concerned with the joys of whusky for a mere Southron. Mr. Frame has an excellent voice; the hearer will need some familiarity with the Scots tongue (1067).

The Emory University Glee Club is, I think, not quite so good as usual in its two records of negro songs, 'Were you there?' and 'Heah dem bells' (1082), and 'Carry me back to old Virginny' and 'Deep River' (1078). 'Heah dem bells' and 'Carry me back' are the best; 'Deep River' is too strenuous, and not well in tune.

A batch of Piccadilly records contains some excellent eighteenpennyworths: The Viennese Orchestra (a high-sounding title for what sounds like a restaurant band) plays Chaminade's 'L'Automne' and a Valse of Kreisler's (137); a vocal quartet, with orchestra, is heard in Gilbert-Sullivan extracts—'Brightly dawns our wedding day' and 'A Regular Royal Queen' (135), and 'A man who would woo a fair maid' and 'Strange Adventure' (136). The part-singing is good, though a lighter touch is needed at times, especially in 'Brightly dawns,' where the bass is far too ponderous; the diction of the male soloists is better than that of the women.

There are some good fox-trots, the best being 'Roll away, clouds,' sung and played by Allan Selby and his Frascatians (1104).

The recording of these 1*s*. 6*d*. discs is so good that one cannot but speculate as to the possibilities of producing records of good music at the same price. There is a big public waiting for the company that can bring off such a coup.

Player-Piano Notes

ÆOLIAN

Audiographic, Duo-Art.—Foremost are rolls Nos. 2 and 3 of the six devoted to 'The Fire-Bird' in Stravinsky's 'My Life and Music' series. No. 2 is well up to the high standard of No. 1 in picturesqueness; No. 3 suffers from a slight decline in interest that is inevitable when a long work designed for stage purposes is heard as pure music. But the decline, we know, is only temporary (D761 and D763).

Nos. 4 and 5 of the Wagner Biographical Rolls, by Siegfried Wagner, carry on the mixture of life-story, illustrations, and copious extracts from the master's music. There is fine matter here for all kind of listeners (D733 and D735).

Thanks largely to its literary matter and the quaint illustrations, the roll of MacDowell's 'Brer Rabbit' is one of the best of the children's series so far issued. Carolyn C. Baldwin is the excellent pianist, and the descriptive notes (embodying the story) are by Percy Scholes (D777).

Mendelssohn's E minor Scherzo from Op. 16 (here called, not inappropriately, 'Fairy Trumpets') is crisply played by Lilly von Kovacs; a trifle more of the presto feeling would have made it even better. The Listener's Introduction is by A. J. Sheldon, and Mr. Scholes provides a versified running comment (D747).

In his 'Children's Descriptive Note' Mr. Kirkham Jones gets all that is possible, and perhaps a little more, out of Moszkowsky's 'Sounds of Spring.' Nadia Reisenberg plays it well (D783).

Many of Bach's organ pieces (especially Chorale Preludes) are unsatisfactory when transferred to the pianoforte. It is the more pleasant when one meets with so successful an example as the Prelude on 'Come, God Creator, Holy Ghost,' finely played by Myra Hess. The Listener's Introduction and running comment by Mr. Scholes give a lot of much-needed information about this side of Bach's output; the plainsong melody 'Veni Creator' (on a Teutonic form of which the Prelude is based) is also printed (D751).

Duo-Art.—There are several unusually good arrangements in this batch. The most successful is the first movement of Tschaikovsky's fifth Symphony, on two rolls, played by Lamond, who is also responsible for the transcription. This is a first-rate piece of work (518,519). Good, too, is Gabrilowitsch's four-hand arrangement of the Minuet from Haydn's 'Military' Symphony—one of the best of Haydn's Minuets (538). There is also a selection from Rimsky-Korsakov's 'The Golden Cockerel.' Arthur Rubinstein gives a capital performance of it, but one misses here the orchestral colour. It is, however, a good roll (6857).

The selection from d'Albert's 'Tiefland,' played by the composer, strikes one as being over-long and patchy in interest (0344).

It seems out of keeping to hear nimble-fingered Geneviève Pitot in Konstki's 'Awakening of the Lion'—quite a jolly march, though with some sentimental lapses, and over-long (7211). This player is heard again in Bendix's 'The Butterfly' (7219)—popular in cinemas and restaurants—and Seger's 'Amaryllis' (7204).

Hand-played.—How much more successful a Pachmann roll is than a Pachmann gramophone record! In the records the tone is usually bad, whereas, presuming the player-piano to be a good instrument, it is impossible to get bad tone from a roll. Moreover, Pachmann has been known to chip in with audible comments when recording, and such comments have been duly promulgated per gramophone. When making player-piano rolls he may talk to his heart's content, and it gets no farther. His rubato in Chopin's D flat Nocturne is on the lavish side, but the performance is exquisite in all other respects (A1111*f*).

Kreisler's 'Viennese Caprice' No. 2 makes pleasant hearing, and is well played by Erno Rapee (A1115*d*).

Themodist.—There are three of these, all good. They are Leschetizky's Canzonetta from Op. 39 (T30404*a*); Coleridge-Taylor's Military March from the 'Othello' Suite (T30406*a*); and German's 'Colombine' (T30403*b*).

BLÜTHNER

Debussy's amusing 'Hommage-à Samuel Pickwick, Esq.' is well played by Franz Wagner (59732). Another number from the same book of Preludes, 'Les tierces alternées' (59733), is also played by Mr. Wagner, whose extraordinary clarity in rapid passages is a delight.

A Tchaikovsky 'Meditation' (No. 5, Op. 72) is very sympathetically handled by Chop-Grunefeldt, who almost contrives to make us overlook the fact of its ending being too long-drawn-out (59746).

The Scherzo from Mendelssohn's 'Midsummer Night's Dream' music makes capital pianoforte music. Julius Prüer plays it with the right crispness and clarity, the result being an unusually engaging roll (58074).

The so-called 'Raindrops' Prelude of Chopin is played by Paula Hegner. The raindrops strike one as rather too substantial at some of the quieter moments (56361).

Chopin's E minor Study from Op. 25 has a delightful performance at the hands of Busoni (55771).

Another Chopin favourite, the popular Nocturne in E flat (Op. 9), comes off less happily in a performance by Edward von Dooren (55780). The melody sticks a bit, and the style is disjunct.

Franz Wagner is heard again in an attractive piece by Schütt, 'Tendre Aveu,' from Op. 43. A less good player would almost certainly have sentimentalised and spoilt it (59724).

The familiar Strauss waltz, 'Wein, Weib, und Gesang,' is played by Erich Neumann (59503).

Respighi's 'Sopra melodie gregoriane' is a virile, even fierce, piece; it makes a fine roll. It is admirably played by Franz Wagner (59727). Rachmaninov's wistful Prelude No. 5 (Op. 32) is made much of by Karl Szreter (59537).

The same player is in capital form also with Rachmaninov's 'Humoreske,' Op. 10, No. 5. The music of this 'Humoreske,' like that of some of the lesser-known Preludes, is so good that one is surprised at the limited amount of Rachmaninov played by recitalists (59583).

A selection from Mascagni's 'Iris' proves to be unequal in interest, as is usual with such things. The playing of Szendrei is, however, above reproach (59667).

Wireless Notes

By 'Ariel'

The letter signed 'A.R.C.O.,' on p. 154, raises an important point. The writer says that he listened to the broadcast of All Saints', Margaret Street, Choir, on January 6, and that the result was so bad as to make him wonder whether the fault lay with the singers or the broadcasting. I did not hear the performance, so can express no view; but I have since received ample corroboration of 'A.R.C.O.'s' complaint. I can readily believe it to be well founded, for the broadcast performances of such accomplished a cappella singers as the Oriana and Harold Brooke Choirs have struck me as doing them a good deal less than justice. In fact, the only first-rate part-singing broadcasts seem to be those of the English Singers, the next best results being from the Wireless Singers. These parties number six and eight voices respectively. The third position goes, I think, to the B.B.C. Choir, with about twenty voices. As the outside choirs who broadcast are usually at least forty strong, it seems that success is in inverse ratio to numbers. If this be so, conductors will need to think twice before they lead their choirs up to the microphone.

Not many listeners bother themselves to apportion the blame for an unsuccessful broadcast. If a choir sounds bad, they will naturally assume that it is bad. I have not heard the All Saints' Choir for many years, but I find it hard to believe that its high reputation is undeserved. Obviously, the unsuccessful broadcasting of choral singing will do a great deal of harm not only to the reputation of the choirs concerned, but also in the setting up of a poor standard of choralism among listeners. When the singing is illustrative of a lecture on the ideals at which choirs should aim (as was the case with the broadcast on January 6), the harm done is even greater than usual.

I suggest that the B.B.C. should do some hard thinking about choral broadcasting. (Of course, they've done a lot already; but they must do a bit more.) One thing is clear, to begin with: As a result of the constant experiments and experience of the Wireless Singers and the B.B.C. Choir, certain fundamental principles must have emerged as to (1) the maximum effective number of voices; (2) the proportion of parts most likely to achieve a good balance (I imagine, for example, that fewer trebles and more basses would be required than in ordinary performance); and (3) the best grouping of the parts. Assuming some knowledge to be available on such matters as these, couldn't the information be summarised and placed at the disposal of conductors whose choirs are engaged to broadcast? If not, it would be fairer all round to confine choral broadcasting to the small and experienced forces attached to Savoy Hill.

The past few weeks have seen yet another outbreak of asinine grumbling in the correspondence columns of the daily press. One grouser's ideal would be a constant stream of light music from 6 p.m. till bed-time—a prospect that makes one's reason totter. Another held that it was high time the B.B.C. engaged 'a few first-class artists.' The obvious retort (which, of course, the anti-B.B.C. Editor didn't make) would be to ask for the names of a few first-class artists who had not been engaged at one time or another. The list would be meagre, especially on the musical side.

The odd thing about the correspondence was that, so far as I could see, not one complaint was directed at the most vulnerable part of the programmes—that devoted to variety turns. Presumably the grumblers are well suited by the toneless and tuneless singers, the 'child impersonators,' and other feeble humorists who exasperate the rest of us. 'Why be exasperated?' asks a reader. 'Why not switch off?' The answer is that these variety programmes usually contain at least one first-rate item, whose time of appearance is not indicated. So, in order not to miss it, we have to listen to the drivel. As a case in point, take the vaudeville show of January 15. The Radio Times gave Clapham and Dwyer as the first item. This pair are among the very best of broadcasting comedians; in fact, their material is so well calculated throughout for the purpose (the humour being entirely oral) that we might put them at the top. Naturally, I didn't want to miss them. But they came on at the end of an hour of rather poor efforts, all of which had to be sat through in order to make sure of getting Clapham and Dwyer.

Some of the poorer turns, it is true, suffered from being unsuitable for broadcasting. For example, Claude Hulbert is a comedian whose effect depends largely on our seeing him. He is only one of many performers who lose a good deal from being transferred from stage to studio.

To go back to the newspaper grousers, we may estimate their mentality by their demand for a diet made up almost entirely of comedy (the weakest element in the programmes) and dance music.

One of the many things about the B.B.C. for which we may be thankful is its freedom from the advertising side that is such a feature in the U.S.A. For example, here is a portion of an announcement made at the beginning of a concert broadcast from New York recently (we take it from Musical America):

'GENERAL MOTORS FAMILY PARTY

9.30—10.30 p.m.

'December 3, 1928

FRIGIDAIRE

'Opening Announcement

'Our guest-artists at this General Motors Family Party, which is being given by Frigidaire, are Miss Rosa Ponselle, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Mr. Eugène Goossens, the British conductor, who reached our shores only a fornight ago. . . . Frigidaire asked them to arrange a program which would include the most sparkling and tuneful sort of numbers in their extensive repertoires; for our host is in a bouyant mood. . . . It is rapidly approaching the time when there will be more than one million of its automatic refrigerators in use; each month having seen a new sales record established by the New Frigidaire, with its nineteen household models, its quiet, economical operation, and its beautiful "Tu-tone" cabinets. . . .

'While the members of the orchestra are taking their seats, Frigidaire steps aside to let the other members of the General Motors Family say "good evening," Chevrolet . . . Pointiac . . . Oldsmobile . . . Oakland . . . Buick . . . La Salle . . . Cadillac . . . Fisher Body . . . General Motors Truck . . . Yellow Cab and Coach . . . Delco-Light electric plants and water pumps . . . and the GMAC Purchase Plan.

'And now we are ready. . . . Mr. Goosens has chosen to begin the concert with the delightful overture from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," in which the instruments seem to engage in an amusing debate concerning the things that are to happen when the curtain rises, &c., &c.'

The 'Foundations of Music' series has been of great value during recent weeks, inasmuch as it has drawn on works rarely heard by the general public. This applies specially to the String Trios of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. You may attend chamber concerts for years without hearing a single example of this form. There are reasons, of course. It has been completely superseded by the pianoforte trio; and we can hardly expect one of the violinists in a string quartet to retire from the field in order to give his colleagues a chance of playing a trio. (On second thoughts, though, why shouldn't he, for once in a way?)

The week of Beethoven's Sonatas was also welcome, because it gave us some of the early numbers that are rarely played by recitalists, but which are, I think, better—or at all events more attractive—than a good many of the later sonatas. I was glad to see, too, that it was found possible to avoid the splitting-up of a sonata between two evenings, as was done during a Mozart series last year.

The week of Bach's Chorale Preludes inevitably suffered from the unsatisfactory state of organ broadcasting. Mr. Leonard Warner seemed to be playing well, but the results were often so confused that listeners who were unfamiliar with the works must have been mystified. And the important ostinato pedal figures in such pieces as 'In Thee is joy' were barely audible. To add to the confusion, it seems that the drafter of the programmes had not realised the importance of making clear the distinction between various preludes bearing the same title. Hence the canonic piece in F on 'O Lamm Gottes' was discussed at some length in the Radio Times in a note that actually referred to the elaborate three-verse Prelude in A on the same chorale. Similarly, the note on 'Wir glauben all' in einen Gott' didn't seem to fit the 'Wir glauben' Prelude that was played—better known as the 'Giant Fugue,' which can hardly be called 'very simple,' and 'almost child-like.'

I rarely hear a broadcast organ recital without being convinced that the instrument and its repertory will never receive anything like justice until a specially designed organ is used. The magnificent new B.B.C. headquarters that will soon be going up in Langham Place must contain an organ with a carefully-designed specification (every stop of which will 'tell,' and none blur), in a room with the minimum of resonance (but not dead). Above all, the Pedal organ must be well supplied with independent 8-ft. and 4-ft. stops. With such an instrument available an occasional organ solo might well be included in a late evening programme. At present real organ music can be heard only in the day-time, or on rare occasions from 6.45 to 7 p.m.

It would probably be an eye-opener to discover how many listeners heard to the bitter end the B.B.C. concert of January 18. Both quality and quantity were no doubt too much for the great majority. Debussy's 'Martyrdom of St. Sebastian' was a bad choice in a double sense. Even at first-hand in the concert-room it must have been unsatisfactory; as a work for wireless transmission it was everything it should not have been—long, vague, dull, and disconnected. I have rarely been so bored. It was stagnation in terms of sound. (I should add that I heard this concert viâ a good set and loud-speaker.)

The Boyce Sinfonia gave me the impression of being better than it sounded. The playing seemed perfunctory, and the effect was too suggestive of an incoming voluntary. The one unequivocal success was Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings—a fine thing, worthily played, and it came over the air splendidly.

The 'Rite of Spring' disappointed me. It was my fourth hearing of the work, and hitherto I had always been rewarded with a few thrills. But the 'Rite' has worn badly. More than ever its monotony told; and its end left me convinced that there is no future for a work which appeals neither to intellect nor emotion. As ballet music the 'Rite' may, perhaps, justify itself; but this performance showed that, divorced from the stage, it was mainly noisy futility.

I question the wisdom of the B.B.C. in giving the Debussy and Stravinsky in one programme. It is right that the myriads of listeners should have an opportunity of getting on terms with modern music; but need the examples consist of music transplanted from the stage—in the one case an admittedly weak sample of its composer's, and in the other a highly debatable specimen?

There are many new and neglected modern works concerning whose musical qualities there is general agreement. The B.B.C. will do far more useful service, and give pleasure to many thousands more of its clients, by giving these a show instead of lavishing its resources on such things as 'The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian' and 'The Rite of Spring'—works which it must know beforehand can interest only a tiny minority.

Occasional Notes

We hope readers will give full consideration to a letter that appears on p. 154, signed by Sir Henry Hadow and Mr. Walter Damrosch. The project concerned—the First Anglo-American Summer Holiday Music Conference of British Empire and American Musicians and Educationists—is a development of the remarkable Field Day held in London last summer. That single day was enough to whet the appetite of all present for a more extended feast—a mere hors d'œuvre to a most attractive menu that is being prepared for consumption at Lausanne during the first week of next August.

There will be something for everybody, from the University Professor to the Elementary School Teacher. The sections under which lectures and discussions will be held comprise Elementary School Music, Secondary ditto, University Music, Church Music, Vocal Teaching and Choral Training, Pianoforte Teaching, Orchestral Work in Schools, and Competition Festivals. Other sections may be added. Each section will be in the hands of two chairmen, one English and one American, who will confer together and with the members, in order that the activities of their section may be arranged to the best advantage of all concerned. (Visitors to the Conference need not enrol as members of any particular section; their presence makes them automatically members of all sections, and they can rove from one to another as they wish, choosing the debates, &c., that specially interest them.) So far the various chairmanships have not all been settled, but we are able to announce that the following have agreed to serve: Dr. W. G. Whittaker (The Use of Classical Songs in Schools), Prof. F. H. Shera (University Music), Mr. Steuart Wilson (Vocal Teaching and Choral Training), Mr. Herbert Fryer (Pianoforte Teaching); Mr. Forbes Milne (Music in Secondary Schools), and Mr. Harvey Grace (Church Music). Among the lecturers will be Dr. E. C. Bairstow. Other names will shortly be available, both of English and American officials.

The social side will be made much of, with excursions on the lake, free-and-easy concerts and communal music-makings, &c.; and there will be exhibitions of music, books, and instruments. The travel and other accommodation arrangements are in the hands of Sir Henry Lunn, Ltd. The charges are astonishingly low, the cost of the week from London and back being only £10 11*s.* 8*d.* This sum covers rail and steamer ticket from London to Lausanne (second class on the Continent), seven days' full accommodation in pensions at Lausanne, including breakfast, lunch, dinner, 'tips,' conveyance of luggage, services of conductor, and steamer excursions on the Lake of Geneva, besides entrance to all Conference events. Visitors who so wish may, at a slight increase of cost, be put up at various types of hotels, or travel first-class throughout.

Members who wish to make the most of the opportunity by extending their stay on the Continent may do so at a moderate tariff, e.g., an extra seven days at Lugano will cost seven guineas. The prospectus gives full particulars concerning the Conference, holiday extensions, &c. Copies are obtainable from the Registrar, Musicians' Holiday Conference, 2, Albany Courtyard, Piccadilly, W.1. It will facilitate the organization if intending members will notify the Registrar early. This engagement will be merely provisional; definite bookings will fall due at the beginning of April.

Here, then, is the prospect of a 'get together' of a unique kind, combining an inexpensive holiday with an opportunity of exchanging ideas not only with our British confrères but also with American workers in the same fields. In some ways they are far ahead of us; in others we take the lead. The Conference will be the first organized attempt to enable British and American musicians to pool ideas and help one another, and we have little doubt that it will receive on both sides of the Atlantic the backing it deserves.

Last month we referred to the choral activities of British residents in Western Africa. We have since received particulars of a West Indian performance that deserves mention. On December 5 the Diocesan Festival Choir of Jamaica gave a concert at the Scots Church, Kingston, with the following substantial programme: Cantata, 'Sleepers, wake!' Bach; Psalm 23, for female voices, Schubert; unaccompanied Motets: 'Come, Jesu, come,' Bach, and 'When Israel came out of Egypt,' Samuel Wesley; 'Hear my prayer,' Mendelssohn; and 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Parry. By way of relief, Schubert's A major Quintet was played. The choir numbered a little over a hundred (forty trebles, twenty-four altos, seventeen tenors, and twenty-two basses), and there was an orchestra of eighteen strings and seventeen wind. The conductor of this live and all-British body is Mr. George D. Goode.

A glaring error appeared in our January issue—nothing less than the entry of Dame Ethel Smyth's academical robes in a place where they ought not to have been. The correspondent who wrote in our London Concerts column about the performance of the Mass in D by the Royal Choral Society did not say in precise words who conducted it. The omission was noticed by a high official of the Musical Times when the journal was on the point of going to press. Having read somewhere that Dame Ethel had conducted something of her own at some concert or other while wearing her academicals, he quickly jumped to a wrong conclusion, squeezed in a line of untruthful type, and went home content. He discovered the error while the machines were going round, and lay awake from Christmas to Boxing Day (but whether that was due to journalistic pains is open to doubt). We thank the many readers who kindly wrote to tell us of the mistake, and we have noted with interest the various ways in which the New Year spirit guided their pens. We also apologise to Dr. Malcolm Sargent, who conducted the Mass, and to Dame Ethel Smyth, who didn't.

We are glad to hear that the recent move on behalf of the chamber music classes in competition Festivals is about to bear fruit. A Chamber Music Summer School will be held at Westminster College, Cambridge, from August 9-17. A letter giving some particulars appears of p. 155.

The University of Durham has conferred the Degree of Doctor of Music on Mr. W. Arundel Orchard, Mus. Bac., in recognition of his services to the art as Principal of the State Conservatorium of Music, Sydney, N.S.W.

Something of Dr. Orchard's excellent work at Sydney was shown in an article in the June Musical Times. We congratulate Dr. Orchard and the Conservatorium.

We have received a tastefully-produced illustrated booklet entitled, 'Hundert Jahre Bösendorfer,' issued in celebration of the centenary of the famous pianoforte-making house of that name. A hundred years is a long innings, and any firm that scores it does so only by solid merit and distinction. The congratulations of musicians are therefore due to Messrs. Bösendorfer.

From 'Society Gossip' in a theatre programme:

> 'One of the most expensive pianos in London was specially made for the pianist in a dance band. To produce a "lisping" effect, it is always kept half a tone lower than its companion piano.'

It seems a waste of good money. There is a piano next door that would have answered the purpose free of charge—though we should hardly say it lisps.

The following appeared among the vocalists' and singing teachers' advertisements in the Daily Telegraph of January 19:

> SINGER JUNIOR, 1928, —— tourer. Splendid condition, 5,000 miles. ———

Although the 'Ad.' is in some ways applicable to a young singer, we think it has somehow got into the wrong column.

Teachers' Department

A MODERN APPROACH TO MUSIC TEACHING:

I.—THE PLACE OF MUSIC IN A GENERAL EDUCATIONAL SCHEME

By Norah H. Bore

> 'Music can be taught; I am not sure that it ever has been in the big way, but I am sure it is going to be.'—Frank Roscoe.

A remark such as this is bound to set us reflecting on the whole purpose and scope of education. It forces us, moreover, to question the part that music has to play in any educational scheme.

What is the outstanding characteristic which differentiates modern educational ideals from those of our predecessors? It is that we aim primarily at character-moulding, not at the mere imparting of knowledge. This changed attitude is largely due to modern psychological research. Psychology has shown us that the adjustment of the individual to his environment, and the full development of his personality within the limits of that environment, are matters of first importance to the educator. If we neglect them, we sow the seeds of misery, suffering, and crime. Again, psychology has demonstrated unmistakably that, given this healthy adjustment to environment, the normal child has an appetite for knowledge and an aptitude for learning so great that even the persistent discouragement of much of our so-called education cannot stifle them.

It is not surprising, therefore, that modern educational experiments are concerned mainly with the individual. The treatment of this problem is still in the experimental stage, but intelligence tests, Montessori Schools, the Dalton Scheme, are indicative of lines along which efforts are being made.

What is the music teacher doing to put himself in line with these developments? Can he learn anything from the findings of such experiments? Obviously he can. The present generation has seen enormous forward strides in musical education. Music teachers, by training and research, are putting themselves into line with modern ideas in a way which would have seemed impossible a generation ago. To-day we aim at teaching music, not merely an instrument—the pianoforte or the violin, as the case may be. This very statement shows the added dignity which the subject has acquired. It has been changed from a mere accomplishment into one of the humanities. Ear training, aural culture, musical appreciation, eurhythmics—these are all off-shoots of this new attitude towards music.

But it is not sufficient to teach our subject on the latest scientific lines. The real teacher has a further duty. He has to co-ordinate his subject with the total scheme of education. He has to realise what is his contribution to the general culture and character-building of the community, and, by investigation and consideration, to ascertain whether this contribution is being made. Music is distinguished from the other arts by the directness of its emotional appeal. We claim that this quality makes music a subject of unique educational value, and provides a leaven the omission of which invalidates much other teaching. All who have concerned themselves with the young will know how extraordinarily difficult the wise direction and education of the emotions may be. The tendency of modern fiction to emphasise the difficulties of emotional adjustment exaggerates what is, nevertheless, a very real problem.

Writers of all opinion tend to-day to emphasise the necessary part which music can play in emotional training. One of the most interesting books considered from this point of view is that of Dr. Agnes Savill, 'Music, Health, and Character.' Here the author, a successful practitioner, describes her awakening to music at an adult age. She traces the effects which music had on herself, and indicates the stages by which her capacity for appreciation grew and what this new power meant to her. Her book is a very strong argument in favour of the educational value of music as productive of emotional sanity and spiritual power.

Incidentally, Dr. Savill states that her youthful distaste for music was due to the inability of the average musician to reconcile actuality and art. She also tells us that the enthusiasm of a well-meaning but misguided lady, who interpreted music solely in terms of visual imagery, did much to make the whole art seem sheer nonsense to her. As teachers, we can draw useful inferences from these remarks. The broad principle underlying the former has already been emphasised in this article. The musician who is also an educator must realise that he has social responsibilities; he must view his art educationally in relation to his social background. If he is to educate in the real sense of the word—that is, to lead onwards—he must have some idea whither he is leading; he must be constructively, not destructively, minded.

Practical experiments undertaken by American psychologists are described in a recent publication edited by Max Schoen entitled, 'The Effects of Music.' * The experiments were undertaken in order to discover the relative effects of repeated hearings of classical and popular music on groups of listeners. The experimenters arrive at the conclusion that 'the appreciation of good music does tend to make for improved morale.' These conclusions are based on a series of physical tests, such as hand-grips, &c., taken before and after each hearing. In spite of the artificial conditions which may prejudice the findings of such a series of tests, they are at least worth considering. If music can re-establish morale we have very definite grounds for its inclusion in any educational scheme.

The importance of this argument is further enhanced by the capacity of music to awaken a response from whatever is highest in our nature. There is neither time nor space here for an analysis of the æsthetic experience. A quotation from Mr. Middleton Murry with reference to art in general must suffice. I think, however, that it is sufficient to establish the claim that music must play a large and important part in any educational scheme fitted to the needs of modern life. 'Creative Art is, on the side of the artist, the product of creative living; on the side of the recipient it is the most potent of all aids to creative living.'†

'No art is nearer life than music,' says Dr. Yorke Trotter. ‡ We claim that it is a medium which develops the physical, mental, and spiritual capabilities of man. On the physical plane it provides a ready means for sense training. It is a medium for the easy co-ordination of aural, muscular, and motor activities. The artificial circumstances of modern life and the emphasis on intellectual attainment have made us neglect this side of education too much in the past. Intellectually, music is rich in material for the educator, although here the contribution which it makes is not unique and only equals that afforded by other subjects. It is in the co-ordination of intellectual with imaginative—that is, creative—work that music makes its most valuable contribution to education.

Here I would again emphasise the social importance of such work in an age like ours. Modern conditions of mechanical labour, lack of leisure, the necessity for highly technical qualifications—all eliminate scope for the satisfaction of this faculty. Music provides a natural outlet for its expression, and helps us to make adjustments necessary to existing social conditions.

Finally, the spiritual significance of music cannot be too highly emphasised. Those who find in art a satisfaction of the needs which religion has provided in the past will readily understand this. All will agree that the æsthetic experience apprehends worlds beyond the confines of our own. It is this wider vision which music affords, and it is this which gives it its supreme value.

POINTS FROM LECTURES

The turn of the year is not a favourable time for lecturing, and Points are few this month.

Prof. Percy C. Buck, addressing the Bournemouth Centre of the British Music Society, said he could not understand why musical history was looked upon by all musicians as being the last thing in dullness. Why was history necessary? If there had not been change there would certainly never have been history, and development or progress in music was nothing but change in technique. In these days people were not prepared for change, and the same state of things had existed through the ages. Dr. Buck was keen on modern music, which, unfortunately, was in rather a 'hash' at the moment. But the fact that no one really knew how the hash would settle was only in accordance with the laws of Nature.

The chairman at a lecture seldom contributes 'points.' But he may dream, and with amusing result when he recalls his experiences. Addressing the Leeds Parish Church Old Choir-Boys' Association, the Vicar of Leeds told of a dream he had had. He was referring to the difference between being chairman at one gathering and presiding at another, and how the duties might become confused. 'I dreamt,' said the vicar, 'that I was reciting the Ten Commandments, as one is sometimes called upon to do, but instead of waiting for the response at the end of each Commandment I said, "All those in favour?" A show of hands disposed of the Ten Commandments with unanimity, and the fact was duly recorded in the minutes!'

Dr. A. C. Tysoe, at the same meeting of Old Choir-Boys, said that in the choice of the music the vocalists had sung that night they had sound evidence that boys learnt something while in the choir. At some gatherings of the kind he had been struck by the poverty of the selected music; it was lamentable when people who had been connected with distinguished choirs chose the most trashy ballads.

'Modern Music' was Mr. Arthur Hirst's theme at the Halifax Sunday Lecture Society. He dealt with four modernist fallacies: (1) that beauty is a matter of taste, (2) that expression is art, (3) that interest is art, and (4) that the mere breaking of rules and laws is art.

'Music as a factor in life' was Mr. Cyril Winn's subject at the Chesterfield Women's Club. Music being an international language, and therefore important, he said there were three things which people should be able to do: (1) to speak the language—that was, to sing; (2) to read it—that was, to read it at sight; and (3) to write the language, that meant they had to try to learn to write it and enjoy it. Another of Mr. Winn's classifications gave music for the feet, the heart, and the head. Music that appealed merely to one part of us was not wholly satisfying. Music to-day was served up in volume; we appeared to be gradually getting deafer to the finer sounds. Spectacles saved our eyes, and he thought in time we should need some sort of 'auricles' to save our ears.

At the Cardiff Cymmrodorion Society, Dr. T. Hopkin Evans reviewed 'Musical Life in Wales.' One of his cues was quoted from Sir Henry Hadow's 'Collected Essays': 'There is no music with true blood in its veins and true passion in its heart that has not drawn inspiration from the breast of the Mother Country.' The influence of folk-song was an example, also progress in the teaching of music, the great advance on the executive side of chamber music, and the consummation in the formation of a Welsh Symphony Orchestra. The National Eisteddfod was flourishing. Men of experience and training had lately been in command, so that the programmes, as well as the executive aspects, compelled the attention and respect of genuine musicians, both at home and abroad. J. G.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS

MUSIC MASTERS' ASSOCIATION SECTION : MUSIC MISTRESSES' SECTION

We have received from the secretary of the I.S.M. the following particulars of an important development of the Society's organization :

The Music Masters' Association was formed in 1903 in order to promote the advancement of music in schools for boys and the discussion of matters connected therewith, and membership is restricted to those responsible for the direction of the music in Public, Secondary, and Preparatory Schools, and to their assistants. The Association has an honourable record of service, and its present membership comprises most of the Directors of Music in the schools noted above.

The executives of the Incorporated Society of Musicians and the Music Masters' Association have been discussing jointly a suggestion that the M.M.A. should amalgamate with the I.S.M. and function as a specialist section of the Society, and the conditions under which such amalgamation should be negotiated were finally agreed.

At the annual meeting of the Association, held in London on Saturday, January 5, 1929, a resolution agreeing to the scheme of amalgamation was passed unanimously, and the Association will therefore function in future as the Music Masters' Association section of the Society. This action on the part of the Association is a most excellent gesture of goodwill, and their support will be very helpful in extending the activities and influence of the reconstituted Society.

Music Mistresses.—The Council, desiring to establish a Music Mistresses' Section, invited Miss Mary J. Alcock (The Maynard School, Exeter), Miss Nettie Atkinson, (Roedean School), Miss Sybil M. Barker (Royal Holloway College), Miss M. Donington (Mary Datchelor Girls' School), Miss Ethel Home (Kensington High School), to form an interim committee, in order to discuss conditions of membership and the special objectives to be attained, having regard to the specialist practice of members to be attached to the section. The committee met for the first time during the period of the recent Conference, and unanimously recommended that the Council establish a Music Mistresses' section. With regard to conditions of membership, these will in the first instance be those prescribed for membership of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and the committee decided to adjourn and to invite a deputation from the Music Masters' Association to consider jointly with them what special conditions of professional practice should be prescribed for members wishing to be attached to the section. Although there is little doubt that all music mistresses on the staffs of secondary and private schools will be eligible, the definitive conditions will not be available for publication in time for inclusion in this article.

By the establishment of these two specialist sections, each electing a member of council, the Society will be in a position to act with authority in all matters which concern teachers of music in schools—such as scales of salaries, pensions, and, probably the most important of all, the question of music as a subject in the curriculum of all schools.

It is hoped that this important development will receive the favourable consideration of all those teachers in schools whose support is both necessary and vital to the successful development of this policy. An organization is now provided whereby teachers of music in public, grammar, and preparatory schools for boys, secondary and private schools for girls, may consult together with regard to their special responsibilities and difficulties, and, as part of the representative body of the musical profession, receive the inflential support of that body in the attainment of their special objectives.

Full particulars will be forwarded regarding conditions of membership of either section if application be made to the General Secretary, Incorporated Society of Musicians, 19, Berners Street, London, W.1.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' Column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

I. O. A. (Nigeria).—(1.) We know of no hymn-tune with variations called 'Ora Labora.' (2.) Yes ; when the congregation is singing, some variation of the accompaniment is not only permissible but desirable. This needs both skill and taste, and should not be undertaken without due preparation. The Year Book Press recently issued a collection of free accompaniments by the late C. H. Lloyd (7*s.* 6*d.*). Any collection of descants would also provide material usable as free accompaniments. Try two books of Hymn-tune Descants by Geoffrey Shaw (Novello, 2*s.* each) ; 'The Tenor Tune Book' (Faith Press, 1*s.* 6*d.*) ; or 'Descant Book,' by Alan Gray (Cambridge University Press, 5*s.*). (3.) There are no organists' journals of the type you mean published in England. The Musical Times and Musical Opinion contain much that is of interest to organists. There are also The Organ, issued quarterly (Chichester Chambers, Chancery Lane, E.C., 2*s.*), and The Rotunda (Rotunda Organ Works, Brixton, about three times yearly, 2*s.*). (4.) You ask if a reader can supply you with a second-hand copy of Curwen's March Album, Book 2, now out of print. We pass on the request. (5.) The Army and Navy Stores are not music publishers, but only sellers. (6.) We don't know a song called 'Daughter of Error.' Does anyone ? (7.) A descriptive booklet on the Liverpool Cathedral organ, by R. Meyrick Roberts, fully illustrated, is published by Musical Opinion, Chichester Chambers, Chancery Lane, E.C. (2*s.* 6*d.*).

T. P.—(1.) Try 'Aural Training,' by F. G. Shinn (Augener, 6*s.*). (2.) Mozart wrote so-called 'Organ Sonatas' ; these are actually works of the concerto type. So far as we know they are not obtainable save in the complete edition of Mozart issued by Breitkopf & Härtel. They appear in Series 23, described as 'Seventeen Sonatas for organ, with accompaniment, chiefly for two violins and bass.' No solo edition has apparently been issued. (3.) For 'a book on musical appreciation which stresses the intellectual side,' try 'Elements of Musical Appreciation,' by W. J. Foxell (Novello, 2*s.* 6*d.*).

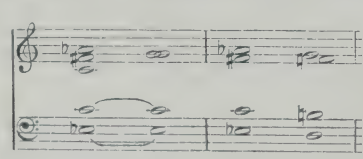
M. K.—For Church choir-training get the primer on that subject by J. Troutbeck (Novello, 1*s.* 6*d.*). For organ accompaniment, J. F. Bridge's book bearing that title (Novello, 3*s.*) and 'Organ Accompaniments of the Church Service,' by H. W. Richards (Joseph Williams, 5*s.*). But remember that all the principles laid down in such books may need adapting in detail to suit local needs and conditions. So work out things for yourself as well, by experiment and observation.

Violinist.—We have no copy of the Concerto at hand. Even if we had, we do not think we could meet your request for 'information regarding the performance,' &c. A player equal to tackling a work of this kind ought surely to be able to do a bit of thinking as to its interpretation. Have a try !

W. J. T.—(1.) As you ask for a book on extemporisation in addition to that of Sawyer's, we suggest Madeley Richardson's 'Extempore Playing' (Schirmer). But the main thing is constant practice on graded lines—improvising melodies of varying lengths, simple harmonic passages, very simple melodies with harmony, modulations, elementary forms such as chants and short hymn-tunes, unambitious little pieces in various rhythms and styles (march, minuet, fughetta, &c.). Use phrases of familiar hymns as bases of short developments; this is of practical use for filling-in during a service. Let your pace be slow in early stages, so that what you play is the result of thought, just as an extempore speech would be. Aim at being logical and shapely until thought and invention move freely; you may then give the improvising faculty its head. (2.) As to the requirement in the transposing test in A.R.C.M. (Organ), inquire of the College authorities. (3.) We don't know of a book dealing specially with the addition of a melody to an unfigured bass. In what we presume to be your present stage, you are surely able to practise doing this sort of thing off your own bat. After all, it ought not to bother you much more (if at all) than adding harmony to a plain bass.

Aures.—We fear you will have to be satisfied with ordinary programme notes as an aid to your study of most of the classical symphonies. There is, however, a fine, exhaustive pamphlet on Beethoven's No. 9, by Prof. Tovey, published by Patersons, Glasgow (2*s.*). You will be helped by Mrs. Newmarch's 'Concert-goer's Library of Descriptive Notes,' vol. 1 of which has just been published by the Oxford University Press (3*s.* 6*d.*). Your plan of hearing gramophone orchestral records, with the score before you, is a good way of improving your aural capacity. But don't forget the importance of developing your mental hearing. Begin with single chords and simple progressions and passages, trying to realise them mentally from the copy, and testing your accuracy by playing them. Get the book by Dr. Shinn recommended to 'T. P.'

H. B. C.—(1.) We have no copy of the piece, so cannot advise you. Questions of this kind should be accompanied by a quotation of the passage concerned. (2.) The interval F sharp/A flat would be most at home in the key of C, especially C minor, for example, in an inversion of the augmented sixth, thus:



Other resolutions are possible. (3.) The key-signatures of D flat minor and G flat minor have no existence save in the mind of examiners out to 'stump' candidates. Music in those tonalities would always bear the signature of C sharp minor and F sharp minor respectively. Such questions are useless, and have nothing to do with music.

Counterpoint.—You ask, 'How is the sonata of to-day constructed?' and 'What is sonata form?' A mere glance through Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas will show you that a sonata may be constructed in so many different ways as to make it impossible to lay down a rule. 'Sonata form' is the term usually applied to movements which contain at least two well-defined and contrasted subjects and their developments, together with some matter of a free, episodical character. But here, too, there is great latitude. Read 'Sonata Form,' by W. H. Hadow (Novello, 4*s.*).

R. H. D.—(1.) The front page of the Saturday issue of the Daily Telegraph usually contains the names and addresses of all the chief London concert agencies. (2.) We imagine that you would be expected to bring your own accompanist.

M. D. N.—The work is out-of-date in many respects, but still contains a good seventeen-and-sixpence worth of information. We understand, however, that a new edition is in preparation, so it will be worth your while to wait a bit, and spend a larger sum more advantageously.

D. K.—The tune, 'Wachet auf!' is generally ascribed to Philipp Nicolai, but there is no certainty as to its origin. Nicolai may have merely adapted it from ancient material, as Luther did with 'Ein' Feste Burg.'

J. C.—See our reply to 'H. B. C.' As we are unable to help, you had better write to the composer, c/o his publisher. (This is what you should have done in the first instance.)

Curious.—We doubt if your old copy of 'The Messiah' (published by Clementi, Collard & Collard, with certain airs in an appendix) is unique or valuable.

'G. C. C.' inquired last month concerning a book on phrasing; we knew of none. Mr. J. M. Jackson, of Newcastle, kindly tells us that Messrs. Hammond publish 'A Practical Treatise on the Art of Phrasing,' by Gordon Saunders (6*s.* complete; or in three parts, 3*s.* each). In replying to this correspondent we said that there appeared to be no book on organ transcribing. We ought to have remembered Mr. H. F. Ellingford's work, 'The Art of Transcribing for the Organ,' inasmuch as we reviewed it some years ago. A number of readers jog our memory. The book is published by the H. W. Gray Co., and may be had from Novello (18*s.*).

As to the hymn-tune 'Rimington,' we have been deluged with letters about it, and also with copies, for which we thank correspondents. 'Rimington' is published in leaflet form by the composer, Francis Duckworth, at Colne. We are told that nearly two million copies have been sold. We are sorry to hear this, for 'tis a poor tune.

For the benefit of 'F. N.,' who inquired last month for a book on Greek music, Mr. Frank Hayes, of Sheffield, kindly writes to say that the Clarendon Press publishes Aristoxenus his treatise on music, translated by Henry S. Macram, the Greek text being given also.

We are obliged to Mr. W. W. G. Baker, of Guildford, for his letter about Mascagni. But 'A. L. S.' required a book dealing with the composer. Obviously the various biographical dictionaries contain a sketch of his life.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

A lecture on 'Brahms's Variations for Orchestra on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56*a*,' will be given by Sir Hamilton Harty on Saturday, February 16, at 3 p.m., at the College. (The work is selected for analysis at the Fellowship Examination in July, 1929.) The work will be played on two pianofortes by Miss Dorothy Manley and Miss Jacqueline Townshend, students of the Royal Academy of Music, by permission of Dr. John B. McEwen, Principal. The chair will be taken by the President, Dr. E. C. Bairstow. Admission free; no tickets required.

The Choir Training Examinations will be held at the College in May next. Application for entry forms and all particulars to be made to the Registrar.

H. A. Harding,
Hon. Secretary.

DIPLOMA DISTRIBUTION

On Saturday, January 19, the President, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, presented diplomas to the recently-elected Fellows and Associates. There was an overflowing attendance of members and friends. Dr. Harding (hon. secretary) began the proceedings by saying: 'It would be mere affectation on my part to introduce our new President, Dr. Bairstow. He is well known to you all, not only as an organist and composer, but also as a fearless and energetic exponent of everything that is highest and best in musical art. I do not, as I have said, introduce our new President, but as hon. secretary of this College, and speaking for you all, I do welcome him most cordially. We consider ourselves very fortunate that he should consent to undertake this office. Now let us show Dr. Bairstow how heartily we welcome him as our new President.'

Dr. Bairstow was received with rapturous and prolonged applause. He expressed his deep sense of the honour conferred upon him by being elected to the presidency, and called upon the hon. secretary to make the following announcements:

For the Fellowship there were 66 candidates, and 11 passed. Lafontaine Prize, H. W. King (London); Turpin Prize, J. E. H. Creed (Reigate).

For the Associateship there were 147 candidates, and 27 passed. Lafontaine Prize, L. G. Thorne (London); Sawyer Prize, G. E. Wiles (Derby). Choir Training Certificate, S. F. Bryan.

The President then delivered his Address, entitled 'Retrospect and an Ideal,' as follows:

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS

We are here to-day in the sixty-fifth year of this College to award diplomas to successful examination candidates. Yet some of us no doubt realise that an examination is really nothing more than a necessary nuisance—one of the many instances where force still has to take the place of love. We look forward to a musical millennium in which musicians, professional and amateur, will so love their art that they will play and teach only the best music in the best way. Not because they would have no possibility of adding certain letters to their signatures unless they did so, but because dull, pretentious, or merely clever music would then present no attractions either to them or to their audiences. We look forward to a time when children will be taught music as a language—will be taught to understand its true message in such a way that as they grow up with it, through familiarity with the language they will easily distinguish good from bad. They will, in fact, see behind the notes to the heart of the composer. Just as we, by a man's speech and by his written word can judge pretty shrewdly of his sincerity, of his power of imagination and instinct for form, so we look forward to a time when people will be able to sum up the value of music as easily as we do literature or speech.

This is an ideal we are not likely to see realised in our time, but it is our business to work for it. I say 'our' advisedly, for we organists are the teachers and general practitioners of music. Many of us are perforce leaders in our respective spheres. People watch us and take their cue from us. It is upon us that the responsibility for the future largely rests.

In estimating the value to music of this College, all we have to ask ourselves is, whether its energies are devoted to bringing this millennium nearer, or whether it has a reactionary and deadening effect. The child, particularly the naughty or stupid child, has to be controlled and disciplined. But we are always attracted to the child who early shows signs of doing the right thing on its own initiative, for then we are convinced that its instincts and motives are sound. We regret having to punish, or to say 'You shall not.' Our teaching is so much the better when it can be positive and encouraging rather than negative and restraining. Looking back to the days when some of us were first connected with the College, we rejoice to see that to-day things are far less negative than they were. Examiners are now more delighted by the artistic work of a really musical candidate than they are thrilled by a sense of their own cleverness in spotting the mistakes of the unmusical. No longer do we attach too much importance to parts of the examination requiring only an accurate adherence to certain man-made rules and moribund conventions. We are now more concerned about root principles than the precise letter of the law. We look for vigorous freedom of movement in a horizontal direction rather than impeccable chordal progressions without it. This applies to playing as well as to paper work, for the man who has rhythm and can phrase, even supposing he is not absolutely note-perfect, will get more credit than the meticulously accurate player who has neither rhythmic vitality nor the imagination to show him what can be done with a phrase. We are learning that the only kind of technique worth the name is that which leads to increased freedom and ease, not that which binds and cramps, for vitality and freedom and beauty of phrasing come from the love of the art, whilst their opposites are due to fear.

We live in an age of stunts. There is a craze for perversion—for putting things to a use for which they were never intended. A certain nation that invented the word has infected us. It is a younger nation than ours. It is not their fault, perhaps, but their misfortune that they have no traditions. Like children, they seize on any new thing and stunt with it. They use the wireless to advertise pork factories and the organ to reproduce the kitchen furniture of the orchestra. Their orchestral programmes are thickly sprinkled with stunting pieces, and their lighter music is constructed entirely of rhythmic stunts.

When in a moment of relaxation one stunts for pure fun, as when the late Dr. Charles Macpherson used to give an inimitable representation of the bagpipes on this organ before the examination began, then we delight in it. It is when self-advertisement is the motive that the art suffers.

Nowadays conductors stunt with the classics in order to get a reputation for individuality. Singers stunt with their voices, using them for purposes other than the interpretation of the text. Organists try to imitate an orchestra or even a farmyard, although an organ is quite worth while as an organ. Students enter for examinations to aid them in worldly advancement, instead of using them as a proof that they have pursued a carefully thought-out scheme of study that will profit them in their art. Sir Hubert Parry once said a very wise thing at a diploma distribution when he occupied this chair. 'The examiners know from your work,' said he, 'whether your motive in presenting yourselves for examination is merely to pass, or to improve yourselves in the art of music.'

Still there are hopeful signs. There are very few examination papers to-day which contain what used to be called 'problems'—exercises in ingenuity but not in music. At competitive festivals one is constantly hearing choirs and soloists whose one idea is to get as near to the heart of the music as may be, without a thought of prize-winning or of self.

This institution is a great steadying influence. It sets its face against stunting either on the organ or on paper. No intricate problems are asked to be solved, no stunt music is chosen to be played. The reason is not far to seek. Those responsible for its policy have always numbered amongst them men whose only thought was for their art. But to-day this is more than ever the case. I can express my admiration freely, for I have lived so far from London since I have been a member of the Council that it has been impossible for me to put in a fraction of the time devoted to the work of the College by some who live nearer at hand. Therefore I claim no credit. But I have been in sufficiently close touch with this place since the year 1898, when I became a Fellow, to notice the difference between those days and these. It is this: members of the Council now think less of what they can get from the College than of what they can do for it. There is a wonderful amount of unselfish work done by very efficient men with singleness of purpose and absolute purity of motive.

If you successful candidates can absorb this spirit of unselfish devotion to your art it will be of far more ultimate good to you than even the diploma itself. It is up to you, as representatives of this College, to set your faces against stunting and humbug. It is for you to remember that, if you have gained something well worth the gaining, you must now give in proportion. Unfortunately, there are many who do not. They value this College according to the material gain they derive from it. After receiving their diplomas they cease their connection with it, because they imagine that the only subsequent benefit that they can obtain is a free copy of the Musical Times once a month. It never occurs to them that if music is to flourish in this country all musicians must be doing something for it. If you are wholly engaged in taking what you can from your art and putting nothing back, then, in the end, you will damage not only the art but yourselves, and all other musicians as well. Seek ye first the Kingdom of Music, and all other things will be added unto you.

Dr. Bullock played the following organ pieces selected for the July Examination, 1929:

FELLOWSHIP

Overture, 'Athalia' ... ... Handel
Sonata in G, Slow Movement, Allegretto Elgar

ASSOCIATESHIP

Chorale Prelude, 'Nun komm, der heiden Heiland' (in G minor) ... ... Bach
No. 5 from 'A Little Organ Book' Charles Macpherson

FELLOWSHIP

Prelude and Fugue in A minor ... ... Bach

Cordial votes of thanks were accorded to Dr. Bullock for his splendidly rendered organ recital (proposed by Dr. Stanley Marchant, seconded by Mr. Thalben-Ball), and to Dr. Bairstow for his spirited and instructive address (proposed by Dr. Alcock, seconded by Dr. Shinn).

The conversazione which followed was of the usually festive and exhilarating character. It was attended by a record number of members.

EXAMINERS' REPORTS

FELLOWSHIP ORGAN WORK

Although the standard of the performance of the pieces was higher than usual, yet the playing of the tests revealed in many cases weakness in general musicianship and commonsense.

Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor.—The quaver triplet was often distorted into a quaver and two semiquavers, which showed poor finger control and absence of adequate pianoforte technique. The rhythm lacked continuity, especially at the cadences, but the registration was straightforward and in good taste.

Charles Wood's Prelude on 'St. Mary.'—Several candidates played this piece too fast, with the result that it lacked dignity and the rests lost their effect. The silent bar was often treated as though it had a pause over it, and the start of the last page was often unrhythmical. The registration, however, was good, the management of the diminuendo on p. 4 being one of the best features in this examination.

Mozart's Larghetto from the Clarinet Quintet.—Candidates should avail themselves of the opportunity of hearing this work in its original form either on the gramophone or in the concert-hall.

The note-values and ornaments in the melody were distorted, the accompaniment was very poor, lacking the necessary legato. The rhythm was often weak when the manuals were changed. It cannot be too strongly urged that continuity of rhythm in organ-playing is of vital importance.

The Vocal Score was on the whole well done, although the Unfigured Bass was harmonized without sufficient regard to melodic shape in the upper part. Candidates are recommended to practise this test in two parts, and to aim at contrary motion where possible.

The Sight-Reading was the weakest part of the examination; improvement can only be effected by regular daily practice. It is important that the pace indicated and the phrase marks should be observed. Many got into difficulties by not observing these marks and by a slow perception of the various modulations due to lack of practice.

In the Extemporisation, it was refreshing to find the swell pedal used with respect, but the style and rhythm of the given phrase was constantly ignored. Maestoso was turned into allegro, and andante into allegro con brio. Chords were not often played together, and in some cases the pedals were hardly used at all. More interest in the inner parts would be welcome.

The melody suffered from over-harmonization, and an obvious modulation landed several in difficulties.

Stanley Marchant.
E. C. Bairstow.

FELLOWSHIP PAPER WORK

Free Counterpoint.—This was on the whole fairly well done, but there was a tendency to adhere rigidly to one chord in a bar, thus making the music mechanical in effect. A study of the vocal parts of the first chorus of Bach's 'Wachet auf' is recommended, as it shows his treatment of a similar problem.

Fugue.—Not a few candidates ignored the stipulation that there should be a three-part stretto on a pedal, and no one discovered the fact that the subject worked as a canon three in one at half a bar's distance. The workings, however, maintained a fair average.

Orchestration.—This was generally badly done. Very few understood how to manage the 'fingered tremolo' for strings. Several candidates wrote a low E for the drum. There was a general lack of musical sense in perceiving the natural beginnings and endings of melodic phrases.

String Melody.—This, too, was badly done in the majority of cases. The key-signature was two sharps. The appearance of A sharp in the first bar made many candidates think the key must be B minor. The ending ought to have convinced them that it was D major. Further, candidates must really be conversant with appoggiaturas and chromatic auxiliary notes. The melody had a perfectly simple harmonic basis, which very few realised. The workings showed a great lack of knowledge of ordinary chromatic chords and chromatic unessential notes.

Composition.—The average of the work was much better, though there was nothing outstanding.

ASSOCIATE ORGAN-PLAYING

The salient feature of our experiences in this examination was the very poor standard shown in the transposition test: the score-reading, also, was often poorly done.

Examiners feel that candidates in general do not take these tests seriously enough; probably they are not prepared progressively or systematically; or, perhaps, in many cases, preparation is not begun sufficiently early. The transposed tune should be played well in time and without hesitation, as if accompanying a choir and congregation—in fact, 'under Service conditions.'

The sight-reading test was all too rarely considered as an accompaniment, and showed a want of the readiness and adaptability called for in that department of organ-playing.

With regard to the pieces, while the playing of some of the candidates was quite good there was a great deal of untidy work. The Bach Fugue suffered in particular through a lack of clear phrasing and sound rhythm; and, in some cases, unsuitable tempo and incongruous registration.

In conclusion, the examiners would impress on future candidates the necessity of graduated, careful preparation for the three tests: score-reading, transposition, and sight-reading.

EDWARD D'EVRY.

ASSOCIATE PAPER-WORK

Though some of the candidates showed exceptional ability, the paper-work on the whole was of only average merit, and some of the work was lamentably below the required standard. There is still difficulty in realising an implied modulation, unless an accidental appears in the given part, and on the other hand, accidentals used chromatically are faultily treated as modulations.

Strict-Counterpoint.—In this there was often angularity of writing, and arpeggios were too freely employed. Movement lacked variety of rhythm. Numbers of examples contained blocks of bars of second and third species only. Another blemish was the use of the diminished triad in other positions than the first inversion.

Free Counterpoint.—This showed improvement. The faults, however, were a pointless use of rests, and a succession of fussy, trivial snippets in place of good melodic outlines.

Pianoforte Accompaniment.—This still shows a want of appreciation of the correct use of the pianoforte in accompaniment. Style varied from a stodgy succession of chords to a fantastic freedom, suggesting a technical study. Unessential notes of the given melody, occurring on the beat, were generally treated as essential notes, leading to clumsy harmony or bad modulation. A preliminary sketch of the chords to be used is advisable.

Melody and Bass.—The most satisfactory feature of the whole examination, both examples showing a creditable freedom of outline. A prevalent fault, however, was the non-recognition of implied suspensions.

Harmonization of Melody.—There was improvement here, but there is room for much more. Some candidates tried to be too ingenious, forcing in imitations that were quite foreign to the character of the given tune, thus leading to cumbrous harmonies.

Questions.—The writing was often much too diffuse. If candidates would attempt to codify their knowledge, answers could well be given more succinctly and clearly. Essays running to six or seven hundred words are quite unnecessary.

NEW HYMNALS

'Enyimba Ezokutendereza Katonda, Awamu Namalobozi' (Luganda Hymn-book, with tunes).

[Kampala: The Uganda Bookshop; London: S.P.C.K.]

Like other hymnals, this of Luganda has grown rapidly. The first book of hymns for the Uganda Church was published in 1889, and contained ten hymns. Twenty-four years later the native study of music had progressed sufficiently to warrant the issue of a book with tunes, but the ability to read from the Staff notation was confined to so few that the work had only a small circulation. Hence the decision, in 1925, to issue an enlarged version in Tonic Sol-fa, and this has now been accomplished. The collection has now grown to a stout book of two hundred and ninety hymns and thirty-eight chant-settings of the Canticles. The material is mainly of the standard type used in the translations of familiar hymns, ancient and modern, the tunes comprising early types by Tallis, Gibbons, &c., German chorales, and psalm-tunes of French and English origin, down to examples of recent date. The Preface appears in both English and Luganda, on facing pages. The notation is entirely Tonic Sol-fa. The titles of hymns and names of tunes are given in English, and so are easily identifiable. To the Church musician at home this well-produced hymnal has a peculiar interest.

'The Winchester Hymn Supplement, with Tunes.'

[Winchester: Warren & Son.]

There are many churches where the desire to increase and improve the hymn repertory by the use of examples from such recent collections as the 'English Hymnal,' 'Songs of Praise,' &c., is hampered by reluctance to discard the book in present use; and the provision of copies of the various new hymnals is inconvenient and expensive. Hence the attempt by the Winchester Diocesan Church Music Committee in 1922 to meet the need by the issue of a small collection of supplementary hymns and tunes. This had so much success that the Committee felt justified in enlarging the venture and publishing it in more substantial form. It now consists of a hundred and thirty-nine hymns and fourteen carols, together with Merbecke's Communion Service as edited by E. G. P. Wyatt and Royle Shore. There are many fine things in the book, as well as some whose inclusion causes surprise and disappointment. Too liberal use has, we think, been made of folk-tunes that have very slight musical value; had melodies of so little interest been signed by one of the despised Victorians they would have had short shrift. That blessed work 'folk' sometimes dulls the critical faculties!

There are, as we have said, some fine and delightful things in the book; there might well have been even more, however, space being made for them by the omission of many hymns and tunes that are already in practically every collection. We are particularly glad to see included Stanford's splendid tune to 'For all the saints.' Our only grudge against Vaughan Williams's deservedly popular 'Sine Nomine' is that it seems to have killed the Stanford tune's chance of becoming as well known as it ought to be. As both appear in this Winchester collection, choirs might well sing them turn and turn about, and so give people two good things instead of one.

The Liverpool and District Organists' and Choirmasters' Association held its annual social gathering at Rushworth Rooms on January 7, Dr. J. H. Reginald Dixon being the guest of the evening. In his address, Dr. Dixon suggested that those present might do something towards ensuring a happy new year by an occasional Sunday's abstinence from the use of couplers, composition pedals, and reeds. The idea is a good one, and might be extended, we suggest, to other use-and-wont effects. For example, we should like to hear the 8-ft. pedal stops used alone, especially in accompanying; hymn-tunes pedalled with the bass at the right pitch, instead of wholly (or partially) an octave lower; fewer improvised voluntaries and more carefully chosen and prepared set pieces, especially before the service (when there is less chance of escape than after); and so on. Organist-readers might put themselves through a stiff self-examination, and decide as to which of their particular vanities might be given up during an occasional Sunday.

The choir of St. Mary Aldermary has arranged to give a series of performances of Charles Wood's 'Passion according to St. Mark,' as follows: St. Mary Aldermary, February 19, at 6 p.m.; St. Margaret's, Streatham, February 26, at 8 p.m.; St. George's, Catford, March 5, at 8 p.m.; All Saints', Gravesend, March 12, at 8 p.m.; Christ Church Congregational Church, Alwyne Road, Wimbledon, March 21, at 8 p.m.; and St. Mary-le-Strand, March 26, at 6 p.m. The performances will be directed by Mr. Alan May.

The South-Eastern Branch of the London Society of Organists will visit St. Agnes's, Kennington Park (near the Oval Station), on February 2. Mr. Edgar T. Cook will give a recital at 3.30 p.m., after which there will be tea and sociabilities in the Parish Hall, followed by Solemn Evensong. The meeting is, of course, open to members of the London Society in general.

At St. Andrew's Cathedral, Sydney, N.S.W., on December 16, the Christmas Oratorio was performed. Brahms's 'Requiem' was given on November 11 (Armistice Sunday). The organist is Mr. T. W. Beckett, who succeeded the late Dr. Tom Haigh.

The organ at Eltham Park Wesleyan Church has been overhauled and completed by Messrs. Bishop. The re-opening took place on January 9, Mr. Allan Brown giving a recital, with Miss Beatrice Ashton as vocalist.

A new organ has been built by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper for St. Andrew's Church, Eastbourne—a two-manual of twelve stops and nine pistons.

Letters to the Editor

FIRST ANGLO-AMERICAN SUMMER HOLIDAY MUSIC CONFERENCE, 1929

SIR,—At the American National Conference of Supervisors of Music, held at Chicago last April, Mr. Percy Scholes, representing Great Britain, attended, bearing with him a book of letters of greeting from all the most prominent leaders of music and musical education in the British Isles. As a consequence of the warm reception accorded to this gesture of friendship, a 'Field Day for Music Educationists, British and American,' was held in London on July 7. Morning and afternoon discussions and an evening banquet offered profitable and pleasant opportunities for the exchange of views and the knitting of professional friendships. The national and international importance of the gatherings was recognised in gracious messages from The King, and from the President of the United States.

The movement now takes its natural further expansion, and in the first days of August, 1929, there will be held at Lausanne a week's Conference of English-speaking musicians engaged in education and educationists interested in music—from that of the elementary school to that of the university. As many such musicians are also occupied with Church music, there will be an additional section devoted to that subject.

The educational and ecclesiastical authorities of Lausanne are welcoming the project very heartily; by their kindness, the University building and Cathedral have been freely put at our disposition for the period, and there the meetings and recitals will be held.

As joint Presidents of the Conference, we desire to take this, the only adequate, means of making the Conference known to all interested, and of inviting them all to apply for the booklet of information that has now been prepared, addressing themselves to their respective 'Music Conference Registrars,' at 2, Albany Courtyard, Piccadilly, London, W.1, and 70, Fifth Avenue, New York.—Yours, &c.,

BERLIOZ'S 'TROJANS'

SIR,—May I be allowed to correct an error in Mr. Capell's admirable article on the above, though I am fully aware that it did not originate with your contributor. In Berlioz's score the Royal Hunt and Storm come before the love duet, and not after, as Mr. Capell suggests; and as the former plan was adopted when the mutilated version of the work was given in 1863, under the composer's direction, we must take it as the correct one, in spite of its involving some trifling obscurities.

The first Tableau of Act 3 in the complete opera ends with the departure of the Trojans to fight the Numidians. The second Tableau is devoted to the Storm Scene, during which Dido and Æneas are seen to enter the cave, where, according to Virgil, the lady was first unfaithful to her late husband's memory. The return of the victors ought, perhaps, to have been emphasised. But as the spectator sees Æneas going a-hunting with Dido, Berlioz credited the audience with sufficient intelligence to grasp the fact that the fighting had finished. For this reason, to play the Storm Scene as an entr'acte frustrates the composer's intentions. The first scene of Act 4 is between Anna and Narbal, who complain of the Queen passing her time in festivities in honour of Æneas, and neglecting the affairs of State. We then assist at one of this series of fêtes. In Scene 4 Æneas relates how Andromache had forgotten Hector in the arms of Pyrrhus, which leads Dido to commence Scene 5 (quintet) with the aside: 'All conspires to vanquish my remorse'—her remorse at having yielded to the hero in the cave. There follows a vast nocturne, first as a septet and then as a duet, in which Æneas describes himself as the Queen's amant, which, I need scarcely point out, has a very different meaning in French to amoureux. To place the cave episode after the duet, and make Dido fall for the first time with a man, who is already her lover (amant), is sheer nonsense. Worse still, it leads the unwary listener to take a wrong view of the duet. Believing it to be preparatory to Dido's compliance, he expects to hear the fleshly transports of a Tristan; being disappointed, he fails to perceive the calm beauty of a scene in which a couple, purged of the grosser passions, tenderly exchange vows in the moonlight. A modern composer would undoubtedly have made a feature of the cave episode—probably expanding it into an entire Act. Berlioz, who penned some of the chastest love-music extant, dismisses the business in a couple of stage-directions.

As an ardent Berliozian, who, having both seen and heard 'The Trojans' complete, considers it the master's finest work, I would thank Mr. Capell for his dignified refusal to pronounce dogmatically on an opera of which he had only heard a fragment torn from its proper milieu. The attitude is that of the conscientious critic, and might be imitated with advantage by others less scrupulous.—Yours, &c.,

TOM S. WOTTON.

CHORAL SINGING AND THE MICROPHONE

SIR,—A recent broadcast conducted by Dr. Nicholson and the choir of All Saints', Margaret Street, leads me to inquire whether any of your readers can throw light on a matter which puzzles me. I have always been led to understand that the singing at All Saints' was of a very high standard, and indeed Dr. Nicholson's remarks seemed to imply that he thought the performance was also of a high quality. My own experience was very much to the contrary. Never have I heard such an extraordinary ensemble as that which came over on the occasion I mention. Not only was the singing unpleasant, but the quality of the boys and the tenors was dreadful in the extreme. The singing of the 'Veni Creator' also was unsatisfactory, the neumes being rendered in one instance something like 'Come, Ho-ho-ly Gho-host, our so-houls inspire,' &c. The same fault was noticeable in 'When the crimson sun had set.'

It is absolutely incredible to me that this is regarded as good singing. I inquired of my friends, who one and all complained of the same trouble, so that disposes of the theory that my set was responsible. Have any of your readers experienced this unpleasant noise when listening to a choir of boys and men broadcasting? Is the microphone more unkind to this kind of choir than it is to mixed voices?

It seemed to me that the layman listening to this performance would come to the conclusion that Dr. Nicholson was, perhaps, conducting two broadcasts, this being the first and showing what a choir sings like before it goes to his school, and a further one to follow after some terms of training. He would never believe that it was a choir showing people how they ought to sing. My impression was that the School of Church Music is a good thing, and I hoped that this choir would be the first to go to it. But perhaps my Radio Times misled me, and it wasn't All Saints', Margaret Street, choir after all. If it really was, and was reckoned to be good singing, then I have no hesitation in saying that broadcasts of this description are bad and do the cause of choral singing much more harm than good.

I should be interested to hear other readers' views. (If you have no room for this in your correspondence columns perhaps you would kindly hand it over to the Wireless correspondent.)—Yours, &c.,

A.R.C.O.

[This matter is commented on in 'Wireless Notes' on p. 136.—EDITOR.]

BATTISTINI

Sir,—May I, as one who heard the Battistini performance of which Mr. Armind Bevan speaks—although I was then a small boy in knickers—ask his permission to fall metaphorically on his neck for all the entirely and wholly admirable and incontrovertible things he says about the great singer who is the subject of his letter, and about opera and singing in general?

Mr. Bevan's disclosure of the fact that this marvellous singer was not asked to sing at Covent Garden after the war, although he would gladly have done so, is less staggering when one reflects on the appalling contrast that there would have been in a performance containing Signor Battistini and some of the bellowing, wobbling howl-mongers who would have been his colleagues. And it is a damning comment on the degradation of Italian singing to-day when it is seen that all the worst of these performers during recent seasons have been Italians. Still, although this to a certain extent explains, it does not excuse the heinousness of deliberately depriving such an opera audience as we still have of hearing what is meant by great singing by one of the last and supremest exponents of an art that, as the great artist Dinh Gilly rightly says, is virtually extinct. In addition to this there is the gross affront of such an action to such an artist, which is in itself unpardonable.

One rejoices greatly to see Battistini's opinion of Dr. Ben Davies's singing, and any who heard the latter's, alas! solitary recital some few years ago at Wigmore Hall could do no other than endorse it. The fact is that the public ear has become and is becoming more and more depraved as it hears ever worse and worse singing in public places from professional singers, not merely of mild repute but of celebrity. This corruption of public taste has now reached such a pitch that on the rare occasions when a singer like Battistini comes among us, the present generation does not appreciate him; it simply cannot hear the beauty, the finesse, and subtlety, of such a singer.

As Mr. Bevan says, it is a pity that young women who may possibly have had twelve lessons should attempt on the wireless (or anywhere else!) such arias as 'Casta Diva,' which only a Patti (or a Boninsegna) could successfully attack. It is astounding to hear the enthusiastic applause that greets such noises.

What now remains to say of our critics who will describe as 'great Bach singers' those lacking the ability to produce two consecutive tones of good firm quality, or to sing five notes anything approaching well, and with hardly enough breath for a one-octave scale even 'sung' as they 'sing' it? As for the pestilent crew who 'interpret,' being unable to make even an approximately pleasant vocal noise ——! —Yours, &c.,

Kaikhosru Sorabji.

FOR MUSICOLOGISTS

Sir,—I venture to bring to the notice of your readers an exhibition which is to be held at Carpentras (Vaucluse) in June. Carpentras is not on the main line of the P.L.M., but can easily be reached from Avignon. The exhibition, which will be held at the library and will probably last a week, will include the following: Manuscripts with neumatic notation; autograph compositions by Bach, Schumann, &c.; letters of celebrated musicians of the beginning of the 19th century; old printed missals; works by Campra, La Lande, Lulli, Gluck, Rameau, &c.; collections of Noëls; works on music; modern music with autographs of the composers; portraits of musicians (water-colours, engravings, &c.); old instruments. Each evening from 6 to 7 o'clock there will be a recital of music of different kinds, selected mostly from the works of composers connected with the town. I am unable at present to give the actual dates of the exhibition.

M. Robert Caillet, the librarian, who is organizing the exhibition, is a keen musician, and is anxious to increase the amount of modern music in the library. As usual, the available funds are slight, but he has succeeded in persuading some French composers to present copies of their works. On his behalf I take the liberty of asking English composers (and publishers) to do the same. English music is practically unknown to the average musician in France, and gifts of compositions will not only be helpful to the library, but will also do something to make the works of English musicians more familiar to the French public. I shall be happy to supply any further information.—Yours, &c.,

J. A. Westrup.

'THE MESSIAH'

Sir,—The Christmas season has come and gone, and all over the country the customary performances have been given of Mozart's or Prout's 'The Messiah.' Is it too much to ask that we may sometimes be given Handel's oratorio for a change? We pride ourselves that the 20th century has brought us an increased sense of the importance of accurate scholarship, and yet the work which every Englishman should know in its purity is perpetually given in 'dished-up' form. We do not play these pranks with the scores of Bach—at least not habitually, and Handel's score does not present nearly such delicate problems of balance between wood-wind and a large chorus. Mozart added his wind-parts for a performance at which, I believe, no organ was available. To-day, not only is there little difficulty in introducing an organ part, but the harpsichord, once thought obsolete, is once more to be had.

One more surprising fact I should like to note. The discovery of a new island or the rectification of a political boundary is usually regarded as important enough to put all existing atlases out of date, and to set the map-makers to work to rectify the omission. Not so in the realm of music. More than thirty years have passed since the original flute-parts of 'The Messiah' were discovered at the Foundling Hospital, yet they still remain in manuscript, and except for one or two enterprising experimental performances, no conductor seems to have troubled about them. Even the Royal Choral Society, which did free itself from Mozart's clarinets and brass for a few years, did not, I believe, restore the missing flute parts.—Yours, &c.,

CHAMBER MUSIC SUMMER SCHOOL FOR AMATEUR STRING PLAYERS

Sir,—I am glad to be able to announce that following my letter in your December issue, so much interest has been aroused that we have been encouraged to arrange to hold a first Chamber Music Summer School in Westminster College, Cambridge, from August 9 to August 17.

Those of your readers who have already written to me on the subject will receive a prospectus very shortly. There may be others who have not yet written who would wish to attend, and I shall be glad to send them prospectuses on receipt of their names and addresses. —Yours, &c.,

A BRAHMS-BEETHOVEN THEMATIC COINCIDENCE

Sir,—In your 'Occasional Notes' for January you ask whether there is a more obvious likeness between themes in symphonic music than is shown between the Finale of Brahms's C minor and Beethoven's Choral Symphonies. I am writing to ask where the resemblance comes in. I heard this mis-statement some twenty years ago, and at each repetition of it I have tried to see once more how so many critics could have been so misled. Try the two tunes together, and the only real likeness—not a very good one, either, when the harmonies are considered—will be seen in bars 10-11. If this is the most obvious piece of coincidence in symphonic music, the Symphony is indeed to be congratulated on its good luck.—Yours, &c.,

H. V. SPANNER.

[Mr. Spanner raises an interesting point, and there is much in what he says. But facts are stubborn things. (1) Everybody (we suppose) is reminded of Beethoven's theme when the Brahms Symphony is played. (2) When Brahms's No. 1 was produced it was violently opposed, and one of the grounds of the 'anti's' was this very resemblance. It was even used as an argument in support of the cry that Brahms lacked originality. So far as actual notes are concerned, the themes are not alike. But nobody can deny that a startling resemblance is set up by other elements—style, shape, mood, and rhythm. There is also the double coincidence that both themes make their first appearance at the tenor pitch, and emerge, like an answer, from a questioning introduction.—EDITOR.]

A BACH TITLE

SIR,—Your kind review of our publications entitled 'Four Sacred Songs by J. S. Bach,' arranged for organ by J. Bernard Jackson, rightly draws attention to the misleading nature of the title. The airs, as you point out, are by J. S. Bach himself, and these pieces consist of free arrangements of them by Dr. Jackson, in the manner of the choral prelude. This will be made clear on all copies sold in future.

—Yours, &c.,

SCHUBERT AT ZSELIZ

SIR,—Comment having been passed (Musical Times, January, p. 63) on my adoption of the spelling 'Zseliz,' in 'Schubert's Songs,' I ask to be allowed a word of explanation. I do not know what authority Grove and Hadow had for 'Zselesz.' That is not a form found in Schubert's letters; and Dahms has 'Zelesz.' I consulted the usual gazetteers and reference books but without result. I inquired of the Hungarian Legation in London, of the Hungarian Telegraph Bureau, and of friends in Budapest, but the Esterházys' country place was unknown to them all. Nor could M. Dohnányi, when I asked him last summer in London, help me. But at the Gloucester Festival I met M. Zoltán Kodály, who happened to know the spot, and who, without hesitation, gave me the Magyar spelling 'Zseliz,' which I thereupon wrote into my proofs. The pronunciation, so I gathered from M. Kodály, is (roughly) 'jellish.'—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD CAPELL.

CORRECTIONS.—In the letter from Mr. G. E. P. Arkwright, on p. 65 of our January issue: line 23, for 'Micrologue' read 'Micrologus'; and in the first musical example from Morley the fifth note in the treble should be E, not F.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Violinist wishes to meet young pianist (advanced standard) for mutual practice of sonatas, &c. Weekly. Bayswater district.—ARCO, c/o Musical Times.

Tenor vocalist wishes to meet accompanist for mutual practice. Good reader essential. Tufnell Park district, or near.—E. A. R., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (gentleman) wishes to practise with singer or violinist. W. London district.—W. WEIR, 47, Cambridge Terrace, W.2.

'Cellist wanted to complete trio.—J. GLAZIER, 15, Spital Square, Bishopsgate, E.1.

Contralto, advanced and experienced, wishes to join quartet, or small party of singers. London.—Miss CLAPTON 23, Groombridge Road, E.9.

Advanced pianist wishes to meet another for practice of pianoforte duets. Bach, Handel, &c. S.E. London district.—A. B., c/o Musical Times.

Singer (lady) wishes to meet good accompanist for mutual practice. S.W. district.—M. D. S., c/o Musical Times.

Enthusiastic violinist wanted to join pianist and 'cellist for mutual practice. London, S.E. district.—GILLETT, 213, Camberwell Road, S.E.5.

Lady pianist wishes to meet 'ceilist or violinist, or both, for practice of advanced classical music.—G. P., 'Lesgla,' North Crescent, Finchley, N.3.

Lady pianist (average) wishes to meet another pianist to practise pianoforte duets. Sundays, if possible. N.W.10 district.—E. W., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (lady) wishes to meet violinist for mutual practice. Saturdays. London, W. or S.W.—A. G. D., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist (amateur) offers services to orchestra, choral or dramatic society in London. Any evening.—J. B. W., 8, Inverness Place, W.1.

Violinist and 'cellist (good amateurs) required for quartet practice of standard orchestral works. (Tavan arrangements, &c.) W.2, or Maida Vale districts.—QUARTET, c/o Musical Times.

Young soprano (two years' training) wishes to meet accompanist for mutual practice. Chiswick or district.—F. B. M., c/o Musical Times.

Lady pianist wishes to meet advanced violinist or 'cellist for mutual practice. Surrey—B., c/o Musical Times.

Flautist wishes to meet accomplished pianist, for mutual practice. Sonatas &c., from Bach to ultra-moderns.—J. T. THOMSON, 211, Anlaby Road, Hull.

Violinist wishes to meet advanced pianist for mutual practice. Sonatas, &c., Also other instrumentalists with view to forming chamber music combination, preferably string quartet. (Could play viola if required.) Mornings or afternoons. Brentwood district, or within easy travelling distance.—X. Y. Z., c/o Musical Times.

Viola player wishes to join 'cellist and violinists for quartet practice. Moderate sight-reader. N.W. district, or near.—H. E. A., c/o Musical Times.

Sharps and Flats

As if I, of all men, would surrender myself to the B.B.C.!—Sir Thomas Beecham.

Many of the conductors who have cavorted in New York during the past dozen years have been simply third-rate actors. I have seen what might have been an excellent performance spoiled by their clowning. Conductors should be kept out of sight if, when, and as they are employed at all. I sincerely hope that the conductorless orchestra experiment will put an end to what has become a public nuisance.—H. L. Mencken.

Many people take the naïve attitude that the conductor makes the music. I know of one conductor who came to New York who had one of the most commanding, relentless backs in the world. Everybody sat up, saying, 'Now we know this is going to be pretty good. Look at that man's back!'—Deems Taylor.

After a lifetime spent in musical criticism, I find that I can no longer read it—thus, I imagine, coming at last into line with the general public. It is bad enough to have to write the stuff; to read it, except for some definite purpose of the moment, is impossible. —Ernest Newman.

The worst punishment we can invent for our children is to say, 'This morning we shall have breakfast without Beethoven's ninth Symphony as we should have had to-day.'—The father of Yehudi Menuhin, the violin prodigy.

I adore Schubert . . . I love 'Carmen,' I love Puccini. . .—Lenore Ulric.

'. . . . . a very budding young violoncello soloist Miss X . . Y . . .'—Local report.

Competition Festival Record

HARTLEPOOLS.—Though only a one-day Festival, this ranks high as a meeting of choirs, especially male-voice choirs. The test-piece for these was Bantock's 'Ballade,' the difficulties of which were taken up with enthusiasm. Hartlepool Excelsior (Mr. D. J. Jones) and Cleveland Harmonic (Mr. Gavin Kay), which were first and second, gave splendid performances. In the mixed-voice class, Cecilian Glee Society, South Bank (Mr. Gavin Kay) and Hartlepools Co-operative Union (Mr. W. C. Holdforth) were first and second. The test-piece was Elgar's 'The Shower.'

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Although it is now ancient history in these fast-moving times, some little reference must be made to the performance of Verdi's 'Messa da Requiem' at Queen's Hall on November 20 last. It is not an easy work to present, and it must be remembered that the performers were 'home products,' so to speak; but notwithstanding, it was a first-rate show. Sir Henry Wood is a remarkable trainer of orchestral players, and on this occasion his forces did him infinite credit. It is no exaggeration to say that many professional performances have not reached the high standard of these students. The quartet of soloists was efficient, Miss Valetta Iacopi, a young contralto from Newcastle-on-Tyne, being the best. A notable choral effort was 'Dies Iræ.'

The Lent term opened on January 3, an exceptionally early date—owing to the fact of the festival of Easter falling in March this year—with a very satisfactory number of new students.

The students of the Opera Class will give the following operas on the evenings of February 5 and 6: 'L'Enfant Prodigue' (Debussy) and 'La Serva Padrona' (Pergolesi). One of the features of these performances is that they will be entirely produced and managed by the students themselves without any professional assistance. This excellent scheme for the promotion of self-reliance also applies to students of the Dramatic Class, who have in preparation 'The Dover Road.'

Mr. Lionel Tertis has again offered a prize of £5 5*s.*, eligible for competition by students who have not played the viola before September, 1928. The piece selected is the third movement (Tempo di Minuetto) from the Sonata for viola and pianoforte by Grazioli.

The following awards have been made: Sainton-Dolby Prize (contraltos) to Kathleen L. Whittome (Woking), Valetta C. Iacopi and Freda E. Townson being highly commended; Battison Haynes Prize (composition) to Elizabeth Poston (Stevenage), Marjorie Corker being highly commended; Hine Gift (composition) to Gordon H. Felmingham (Hampstead); Rutson Memorial Prize (sopranos) to Phyllis Edmundson (Birkenhead), Joan Coxon being highly commended; Rutson Memorial prize (tenors) to Wilfred Miles (Ystrad); J. & J. Brough Prize (violin) to Adna Ryerson (Japan), David Taylor being very highly commended; Philip Leslie Agnew Prize (male pianists) to Robert O. Edwards (London), Harold Jaeger being highly commended, and Yelland Richards commended; Fred Walker Prize (male vocalists) to Wilfred Miles (tenor) (Ystrad); Potter Exhibition to Connie Cox (London), Margaret Carmichael being highly commended, and Gwenyth Misselbrooke commended; Lionel Tertis Viola Prize to Esme Haynes (London), Eileen Grainger being very highly commended; Westmorland Scholarship (male vocalists) to Roland T. Dickinson (tenor) (Hednesford), Brinley Harris being highly commended; Joseph Maas Prize (tenors) to David Brinley Harris (Swansea); R.A.M. Club Prize (composition) to Mary M. Couper (London), Monica Myatt being highly commended, and Ethel M. Winfield commended.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The vagaries of the calendar made it necessary to start the Easter term within a few days of the New Year, and give short shrift to the popular conception of 'Christmas holidays'; but there were very few absences on the opening day, a large audience attending the terminal address by Sir Hugh Allen, the director. This was, of course, a family affair, so to speak, given to and for students and their friends, but a few characteristic passages, of wider appeal, may well bear quotation. Speaking of the desire to avoid drudgery as being too often a deciding factor in the choice of a career, Sir Hugh Allen said: 'There is undoubtedly a very considerable tendency on the part both of parents and their offspring to expect the plums to fall into their mouths, and to wait for this to happen, even if there are no plums to fall. Naturally the parents are very anxious that the lives of their children shall be lived in pleasant surroundings with not too much to do and a considerable amount to get, with nice friends and an atmosphere of gentility and prosperity and prestige, but they frequently forget that there can be no talking of the future until a past has been created. If we do not learn to work, apart from what we work at, during the time we are eighteen to twenty-three, we shall have small chance of carrying off any prize in the world's competitions. Some people think there is no virtue in enjoying work for its own sake, apart from its definite and useful application to some desired end. It is what is sometimes called or thought to be technique, but it is really learning the use of your tools before you can apply your knowledge easily and well to the particular job to which those tools belong. Behind this willingness to grind at things because they are important to a special object in view, there must be the power to stick at any work, however dull or uninteresting, just because it has got to be done. No one is ever going to succeed in life who applies himself with keenness only to things he likes or is interested in. I would more readily trust a fellow to do a job well who has shown he can stick it out, dull or fine, than the fellow who makes even a brilliant show in some, to him, particularly interesting thing. Ordinary life is made up much more of dull than of brilliant things, and the man who can bring a willing and keen mind into the dull surroundings of every-day tasks is going to benefit his time and generation, even though no one ever hears of him in it.

'It seems, of course, a waste of time to spend years in learning to do something which we feel we are able to do by the light of Nature. We find, however, that in the process the light of Nature often gets steadily less. But as it is darkest before the dawn, it generally turns out that when the training and the grinding seem to be the most hopeless, some light upon the reasonableness of it all begins to appear, and we find that we have, in the process, learned something very important and precious—in fact, we have found ourselves.

'Music is a fine thing to devote your life to, but it is no soft option; it requires hard training, great ability, tenacity of purpose, and good vision. There is not the glamour of the army, and there is much of the painful drudgery of the law; there are no easy billets waiting for us in the City, but its rewards are various. It makes for happiness, and spreads it; it ministers to the well-being and the comity of nations, and makes for a better understanding in the world.'

The fixtures arranged for the term include the usual concerts and recitals in the Concert Hall, and, in the theatre, performances of 'Hansel and Gretel,' scenes from 'Aida' and 'Samson and Delilah,' and the production of Dr. Vaughan Williams's new 'Falstaff' opera, now re-named 'Sir John in Love.' There will also be a second course of lectures for teachers in L.C.C. schools, on the lines of the successful course held last spring.

The following terminal awards are announced: Liverpool Scholarship—Winifred Gaskell; Cobbett Prize—Imogen Holst and Grace Williams; Edmund Grove Exhibition—divided between S. E. Doreen Clarke (organ) and Madge Dugarde (violin); London Musical Society's Prize—Emlyn Bebb; Council Exhibitions—Ethel M. Pearce (pianoforte), Kathleen Collins (pianoforte), Margaret J. Rees (singing), Carlotta E. Balfour (pianoforte), Sidney P. Compton (organ), Christine Gordon (violin), Lilian Harris (pianoforte), William E. Headlam (violoncello), Dorothy Ivimey (singing), E. Maida M. Jones (violin), Marjorie Lindley (pianoforte), Mary B. MacIver (singing), Madeline J. Reeves (viola), Marguerite Sloane (violoncello), Nina H. Smith (singing), Grace Williams (composition). Extra Awards—Annie S. Barns (singing), Leslie G. Orrey (pianoforte); ffennell Prizes (Class 1)—E. Carey (pianoforte and class work), E. Devis (pianoforte and class work), C. Godwin (violin and class work), B. Maccabe (pianoforte and class work), R. Morley (violin), V. Oswell (pianoforte and class work), E. Papworth (pianoforte), K. Porteous (pianoforte), J. Morgan-Smith (pianoforte), M. Pelloe (pianoforte); (Class 2)—K. Brown (violin and class work), H. Giles (pianoforte and class work), M. Lambert (pianoforte and class work), N. Randall (pianoforte and class work), M. Watts (pianoforte and class work), J. Whish (pianoforte), N. Leaver (pianoforte), H. Scott (pianoforte).

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD: AWARD OF MEDALS

The following candidates gained the gold and silver medals offered by the Board for the highest and second highest honours marks, respectively, in the final, advanced, and intermediate grades of the Local Centre Examinations in November-December last, the competition being open to candidates in the British Isles: Final Grade Gold Medal, Constance A. Hope, Wolverhampton centre (violin); Final Grade Silver Medal, Thomas McG. L. Turner, Gloucester centre (violin); Advanced Grade Gold Medal, Carl O. Lewis, Bournemouth centre (violin), and Catherine E. Churcher, Portsmouth centre (pianoforte) (these two candidates gained an equal number of marks); Advanced Grade Silver Medal, Ann S. C. Ram, Bournemouth centre (pianoforte); Intermediate Grade Gold Medal, Jean E. Stewart, London centre (violin); Intermediate Grade Silver Medal, Beatrice A. Jones, London centre (pianoforte).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

To the recent regretted losses by this College in the deaths of Dr. C. W. Pearce and Dr. E. F. Horner, that of George F. Vincent and Frank G. Metford Ogbourne are now to be added. Mr. Vincent, a younger brother of Dr. Charles Vincent, was associated with the College as an examiner at home as well as throughout Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and South America during the past thirteen years, and Mr. Ogbourne was for many years on the teaching staff.

The following annual awards to students have just been made: Gold Medal—Phyllis Ada Ivermee, Mus. B.; Chappell Medal—Winifred Evel Burns; Alfred Gibson Prize—Florence Joan Worsdell; Nasmith Prize—Mollie O'Halloran; Dando-Nasmith Prize—Freda Davis; Grosvenor Gooch Prizes (Michaelmas term)—Patrick Newton Biggs and Gwendoline May Hanson.

A very pleasant and successful concert was given by three scholars at the College on a recent evening. The vocalists were Mair Thomas and Edith Pope, with Hubert Greenslade at the pianoforte.

At the Liverpool centre a distribution of medals and prizes recently gained by candidates at this centre was held on December 3. Dr. A. W. Pollitt presided, and presented the prizes. There was a large attendance of teachers and others, the College being represented by the secretary, Mr. Rodwell. Tea was provided, and an enjoyable afternoon was spent, Mr. W. R. Fell, the local secretary of the centre, being responsible for the excellent arrangements.

Successful distributions were also held at Chichester and Bournemouth, where Mr. E. d'Evry attended on behalf of the College.

London Concerts

THE BACH CHOIR

At the concert on December 28 Dr. Adrian Boult made his first appearance as the Choir's conductor. The programme was enterprising, with Hugo Wolf's 'Fire Rider' and Kodály's 'Psalmus Hungaricus,' and the Magnificat of Bach. The Choir was in better voice than usual; only the tenors left much to be desired—their tone is apt to be raw in forte and high passages. But all the singers badly need drill with their words. In the 'Fire Rider,' even the programme failed to enable us to catch more than a stray word; in fact, we lost our place. The over-quick pace was only partly to blame.

In the Psalm the Choir caught much of the right passionate note, and would no doubt have caught more had the soloist (Mr. Parry Jones) shown them the way. There were some fine climaxes in the Magnificat. A quasi-novelty was a Bach Aria sung by Miss Dorothy Silk with a delicious obbligato for three flutes; and Mr. Keith Falkner gave a noble performance of the solo Cantata, 'Ich habe genug.' The 'Freischütz' Overture set a fine standard of playing, which was maintained throughout.

B.B.C. MODERN CHAMBER CONCERT

Chance interfered with the latest of the B.B.C.'s interesting concerts of modern chamber music, now held at the cosy hall of the Arts Theatre Club. Madame Claire Croiza, engaged to sing in a number of French works for voice and various instruments, was unfortunately taken ill, so that at the last moment the International String Quartet had to be enlisted. The result was that the programme no longer depended entirely upon the taste of the organizers, who, we may be permitted to deduce from precedent, probably consented to the inclusion of at least one of the emergency works only because the performers happened to have it readily rehearsed. The B.B.C.'s scheme for these concerts given on the first Monday of each month, comprehensively labelled 'contemporary,' is in fact rather rigidly exclusive, so much so that they may well go down in history as our 'Monday un-Pops.' The almost invariable presidency of Schönberg, represented either by his own work or that of his disciples, makes one suspect the influence of predilections excusable and interesting in a particular person, but not altogether natural to a corporation.

Vicissitudes notwithstanding, the high-priest duly officiated on January 7. Mr. Eduard Steuermann played the Five Pianoforte Pieces, Op. 23, with all the air of conducting a solemn rite. It was his earnestness and the superb pianistic gifts he had already shown in Busoni's Six Elegies that persuaded one to sit through the function with becoming composure. Perhaps the magic name of Schönberg on the programme also did something to preserve an appearance of respectful interest. It is certain that if a pianist had sat down with an air of facetiousness and invited us to listen to these pieces as his own improvisations, we should all have objected that he was making parody too easy for himself and giving us neither good music nor good fun. And surely not the least indignant would have been the Schönbergians, for one may be allowed to doubt whether any of them, if it came to the point, could distinguish between their idol's pianistic utterances in this vein and a mischievous wag's imitation of them. The objection to these pieces is not that they are nonsense, for one does not for a moment call Schönberg's sincerity in question, but that they are written in an idiom in which no man not forewarned can trust himself to tell sense from nonsense. A composer has a right to make a new language for himself, but even the newest language must have a vocabulary susceptible to some sort of grammatical treatment, and a syntax. Schönberg's new Dance Suite for pianoforte, Op. 25, for instance, is written in a highly formalised new idiom, though even there it is questionable whether the ultimate test of the ear will justify a theoretically interesting system. Op. 23 quite definitely yields nothing to study or to hearing.

Busoni's Elegies spoke quite eloquently to everyone, though their curiously cold, intellectual aloofness repelled most people. That they are a great executant's rather than a great creator's music was evident, not only because of the extreme technical difficulties, which Mr. Steuermann overcame triumphantly, but because one is always conscious that Busoni's unquestionably great imagination was never at work at the scource of musical invention. His ideas are poor in their essence, and acquire significance only in the process of being worked out with a kind of last-minute resourcefulness that is ingenuity almost amounting to genius.

There is no need to discuss the two works with which the International String Quartet came to the rescue, both of which had been given by the same performers not long before. They were the fresh and agreeably countrified Fantasy Quintet by Vaughan Williams, admirably played with Mr. Raymond Jeremy as second violist, and the enormously difficult, formally refractory, but highly interesting sixth String Quartet by Bernard van Dieren. E. B.

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC CENTRE

It is a quaint reflection upon our concert life that critics should constantly compliment the Brosa Quartet upon knowing the music it plays. But there it is. What with those who do not like work, and those who assume that in modern music it does not matter much what you play, especially since the audience knows no better, there is something quite exceptional in hearing a modern quartet played as the Brosa team played the works of Van Dieren and of Ernst Toch at the Court House on January 16. They knew to a nicety what they were driving at, with the natural consequence that the audience found both quartets not only clearly intelligible but of great interest. That of Van Dieren, his third, after such a hearing clears up wonderfully as an expression of a mind in which a purely lyrical vein of invention and a natural fondness for musical dialectics (sometimes even musical casuistry) are constantly playing hide-and-seek one with the other. Toch, on the other hand, is one of those modern German composers whom the reaction from romanticism has carried in the direction of assertive vigour. In fact at this stage he is the most convincing of them, though one suspects it to be a matter of anno domini, he being still young enough to find some satisfaction in thumping himself on the chest and showing his muscles. His splendid mode of utterance certainly throws down the gauntlet to those who find chamber music tedious. It makes boredom impossible, and that goes a long way. We want to hear more of Mr. Toch.

Energy of another kind was displayed in the 'Scènes Turques' of Djemal Rechid, both by the composer and by Madame Janine-Weill, the pianist, who played them. Most of it was misapplied. Eastern music is not so percussive as all that. The rest went to show us the reaction of an Oriental to Western methods.

By his name he is a Syrian, or an Arab—one scarcely thinks of a real Turk in such a connection. He has mastered the keyboard, but brings to it an improvisational spirit that is wholly of the East. At present the two do not blend well, but that is not to say that they never will. He is studying at Paris. Should he acquire a French sense of proportions, of economy, or of justesse, he may yet bring Damascus and Bagdad musically to Paris and London. E. E.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

Mr. John Barbirolli conducted the Philharmonic concert on January 17. There were two compositions of the 18th century and two of the 20th.

Vivaldi's Concerto in E minor for strings had been edited by Dr. Mistowski from a MS. 'recently found by accident in a house in Surrey, by Mr. André Mangeot' (to quote from Mr. Blom's note). It is well worth hearing. We get much Bach nowadays and little of his predecessors; and this revival was a proper reminder of the great man's obligations to the Italian school. The Italian music of the early 1700's is generally thought of as being rather severely formalised, but this Concerto had plenty of surprises, notably in the dramatic apprehensiveness of the slow movement and in the very fresh and springing Finale. Mr. William Reed played the principal solo.

Haydn's 'Oxford' Symphony in G made a disappointing effect owing to the young conductor's excessively taut and laboured style. He seemed afraid to let the music go—as afraid as a conductor of the past would have been of the peculiarities of Debussy's scores. But in Debussy, Mr. Barbirolli was at home. The performance of the symphonic suite, 'La Mer,' added to his growing reputation. It was very good indeed; and as for the music itself, it aroused enthusiasm. 'La Mer' is surely Debussy at his very best. It had not been heard for long, and it came back with an unexpected force and wild poetry, as well as the charm of Debussy's minor surprises of colour and turn of phrase. No doubt, more still might have been done with the ingenious and difficult score; but conductor and orchestra deserved congratulations.

On the other hand, the effect of Delius's Violoncello Concerto, in which the soloist was M. Alexander Barjansky, fell short of expectation. The work, a very beautiful one, is a typical Delian meditation, and any attempt to force it into an eloquent address is useless. Beecham once said that no modern music stands in such need of editing as Delius's, so lacking are the composer's MSS. in phrasing and dynamic signs. If in this performance of the Concerto neither soloist nor conductor seemed too happily at home, it may have been because they were taking Delius's phrasing (or lack of it) too literally. How hard it is to divine the truth about these modern men when one does not know their scores and has nothing to go upon save what one hears! Delius sounds ravishing some days, and quite dull on others. C.

B.B.C. SYMPHONY CONCERT

Even for an organization with the resources of the B.B.C. this concert (at Queen's Hall, on January 18) erred somewhat on the side of ambition. To perform adequately Stravinsky's 'Sacre' involves a great effort for all concerned. Confronted, in addition, with an entirely unfamiliar work by Debussy it is not surprising that there were signs of fatigue. This was most apparent in the opening section of the 'Sacre,' which is mainly for wood-wind. There had been, I am told, a lengthy and arduous rehearsal only a little while before the concert, and the playing of all wind instrumentalists is liable to suffer from overstrain. Despite Ansermet's intimate knowledge of the score, and his great dexterity, this fatigue, and in some respects the composition of the orchestra, stood in the way of his securing as good a performance as some others London has heard. Yet the effect was there, and on broad lines unimpaired. It is curious how controversy concerning this work has continued in this corner of the musical world long after the Continental centres have made up their minds about it. But to-day, at last, it appears to have subsided, since we have the leading newspaper in the country expressing surprise that 'its enormous vitality, its sheer effectiveness, not to speak of its power and significance, could ever have been obscured by the strangeness of its tone of voice.'

Like most incidental music, that of Debussy to D'Annunzio's 'St. Sebastian' includes some trivial episodes which lose all significance when detached from their dramatic situations. It also comprises some episodes of rare beauty, but the effect of these suffers, in concert performance, from the lassitude engendered by the former. An ideal selection has not yet been made. That of the composer is purely orchestral, and, moreover, finishes en queue de poisson. This integral performance will certainly not help the work to great popularity since, apart from this objection, the vocal element was deplorably lacking in interpretative imagination. The soloists ploughed through their parts with stolid determination, and scarcely ever conveyed the slightest suggestion of the mystical side of the work, and the chorus fell short of the B.B.C. standard.

The programme opened with Boyce's 'Eighth Symphony,' for a few decades the most popular of his instrumental works under the designation 'The Worcester Overture.' As this indicates, it was composed for the Three Choirs Festival which Boyce conducted. This being easy music, it had probably had to give way to the 'Sacre' and Debussy in the matter of rehearsals, for it was played without any buoyancy whatever. People must have wondered what Constant Lambert could have seen in such music to think it deserved re-editing. He certainly saw what the audience did not hear.

The performance that was least open to adverse criticism was that of Elgar's splendid Introduction and Allegro for strings—one of his best works—which, presumably, every player knew. This provoked enthusiasm, which Ansermet prompted the orchestra to acknowledge in the usual manner. Poor man! He had a stupendous task and made the best of it. But the B.B.C. forces had evidently bitten off more than they could chew, at all events in the time allotted for mastication.

ARTUR SCHNABEL

At the first of Mr. Gerald Cooper's series of concerts in Æolian Hall, on January 11, Mr. Artur Schnabel played Weber's Sonata in A flat, Mozart's Sonata in D major (K. 576), the two Rhapsodies of Op. 79 by Brahms, and Schumann's 'Humoreske.' Mr. Schnabel is one of the most interesting of living pianists. His technique, which is of virtuoso standard, is never set in the forefront, but is completely at the service of his mind, and his mind is entirely preoccupied with the musical thought of the works he is playing. The result is that his technique adapts itself to the style of the composer, instead of the style being twisted, as happens in nine cases out of ten, to suit the technique and temperament of the pianist. Weber's Sonata, as played by Mr. Schnabel, sounded a very noble and romantic piece of music. It has its bare patches, which Mr. Schnabel did not attempt to conceal beneath pretty effects of pianism, for it is not a part of his business to pretend that the composer is being profound or clever when he is merely filling in the gaps between two ideas. Where there is an idea Mr. Schnabel may be relied upon to get the fullest value from it. The performance of Mozart's Sonata was a striking instance of the adjustment of his playing to the composer's style. It was beautifully balanced and as elegant as possible, yet not empty; and there was no attempt to read into the music meanings of which Mozart never dreamt. The performances of Brahms and Schumann were no less interesting and alive, but here—and especially in the Rhapsodies—the pianist seemed to be unable to get all he wanted, and we had an impression of baffled effort. The recital was well attended, and made an excellent beginning to this most admirable series of concerts, at which we may be always sure of hearing good music well performed.

PRO ARTE QUARTET

The Pro Arte Quartet appeared at Mr. Gerald Cooper's concert on January 15, and played most admirably Schubert's Quartet in E minor and Kœchlin's in D major. The latter is one of the few examples of modern music in which the composer spares the rod. In fact, there is only one moment (in the second movement) when a quick trill in the second violin and harmonics in the first and in the viola provide a somewhat purposeless and futile interlude, and make us wonder what the composer had in his mind. Apart from this, the work is exceedingly lucid and closely knit.

The Mozart Quintet in C major (in which Messrs. Onnou, Halleux, Prévost, and Maas were joined by Mr. B. Shore) was a less satisfactory performance—partly because the interpretation did nothing to hide the conventionality of the form, and partly because these justly famous artists fell for once under the sway of elementary instincts and made expression inevitably subservient to the shape of the phrase. The constant rising in the volume of tone whenever the phrase rose in pitch resulted in monotony, and the gruppettos of the first movement betrayed an anxiety which is alien to the easy, soft atmosphere of the music.

HEWITT STRING QUARTET

Quartet-playing has been brought to a fine art in recent years, and there are not a few claimants for the first place. The Hewitt Quartet (Messrs. H. Hewitt, Henri Benoit, Albert Locatelli, and Camille Delobelle) gave sound and adequate readings at Æolian Hall on January 19, but cannot take rank with the best. For one thing, the intonation of the leader is not always flawless; for another, the interpretation is adequate rather than inspiring. Ravel showed competence, serious aims, and sound preparation. But Franck's music, more romantic and less essentially technical, relying for its effect on a perfect outline more than on fineness of texture, seemed less congenial to Mr. Hewitt and his colleagues. The performance lacked spirit, and at certain sections became positively dull.

F. B.

THE LONDON SINGERS

Five members of the Oriana Madrigal Society, led by Miss Beatrice Hughes-Pope, have banded themselves together for the performance of madrigals and part-songs. A good vocal ensemble is not achieved at once, even by highly trained performers, and the London Singers still need a good deal of practice together to make the balance of the parts more perfect. But they showed at a concert given at Leighton House, on January 10, that they have made a good beginning. They are fortunate in being able to build upon a sure foundation, for the bass is sure of his notes and firm in his rhythms. It is the inner parts which need strengthening both in tone and in assurance. The programme contained a good selection of English madrigals, some duets, and arrangements of folk-tunes. Miss Mulvey played the accompaniments, and contributed to the programme some solo pieces by Bach.

D. H.

MISS MARCELLE MEYER

Miss Marcelle Meyer, who gave a recital at Æolian Hall, possesses a brilliant pianoforte technique, but her range of musical sympathy seems to be somewhat limited. She is, at any rate, heard to the best advantage in short pieces, such as the Sonatas by Scarlatti and the Toccata by Paradies, with which she opened her programme. A hard tone and a glittering style are not sufficient to do justice to Chopin's B flat minor Sonata, although a certain rigidity in the rhythm and the hardness of tone served her well enough in the 'Marche Funèbre,' especially as she softened it now and again with apt touches of feminine sentiment. The arrangement of Stravinsky's 'Petrouchka,' with which Miss Meyer ended her programme, is an exacting piece of bravura, and here one felt that the pianist's powers were not quite equal to the difficulties, while the stiffness of rhythm, to which allusion has already been made, detracted somewhat from the fire of these dances. ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

'The Messiah,' it is scarcely necessary to state, was performed by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall on January 5. The fidelity of the choir to the finest of our musical habits was matched by the fidelity of the public. Both responded well to the test, and so did the conductor, Dr. Malcolm Sargent. We wish we could say the same of the soloists. They sang without mistakes, and they followed the best traditions. But one did not need to be brought up on the Albanis to know how far they were from the big heart of the music. Mr. Harold Williams showed the form of a Handelian, and if he had been a true bass he would undoubtedly have acquitted himself worthily.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAS

These have been busy during the holiday season. Their concerts do not rank among the events that make history and call for description, although as part of the musical life of the community they may be far more valuable. We have space only to offer them a general expression of good-will, and of the admiration provoked by their choice of the following works:

Royal Amateur Orchestra (Mr. Arthur Payne).—Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony; first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (Mr. Melsa).

Civil Service Orchestra (Mr. B. Patterson Parker).—Handel's Concerto Grosso in B flat; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (Mr. Albert Sammons); Mozart's Symphony in G minor.

The Amateur Orchestra of London (Mr. Wynn Reeves).—Glazounov's sixth Symphony; Max Bruch's Overture to 'Loreley'; Rimsky-Korsakov's Overture, 'Doubinouchka' (such a programme of rarities nearly does make musical history).

The Stock Exchange Orchestra (Mr. Edric Cundell).—Stanford's first Irish Rhapsody; Brahms's Violin Concerto (Miss May Harrison).

Music in the Suburbs

Among the choral societies of London that do their work away from the centre of things there are several that maintain a high spirit of enterprise, and among these none is more conspicuous than that of the People's Palace, of which Mr. Frank Idle is the conductor. On January 12 this Society gave a work that is but rarely heard nowadays, 'The Dream of Jubal'—and gave it well. It is not an easy work, but this choir and amateur orchestra were quite up to the level required of it. The narrator was Mr. Basil Maine, and the principal singers in this cantata and in 'A Tale of Old Japan,' which followed it, were Miss Alice Moxon, Miss Doris Cowen, Mr. Frank Titterton, and Mr. Stuart Robertson.

The music played by the Thames Valley Orchestra, under Mr. F. W. de Massi-Hardman, at Surbiton, on November 17, included the 'Magic Flute' Overture and the 'Italian' Symphony. This was the opening concert of the Society's second season.

Leoni's 'The Gate of Life,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and a selection from 'Israel in Egypt' were sung by the Ealing Philharmonic Society (Mr. E. Victor Williams) on November 24. The Ealing Choral Society (Mr. Herbert Dawson) gave 'The Golden Legend' a fortnight later.

Islington Choral Society, temporarily conducted by Mr. Edric Cundell in the absence of Mr. Ronald Chamberlain, gave a new work of Mr. Cundell's, a 'Hymn to Providence,' on November 24. The Westminster Orchestra assisted.

Somervell's 'The Power of Sound' was performed on November 24 by Penge Choral Society (Mr. Alfred C. Choat).

The 'Italian' Symphony was played by the Harrow Philharmonic Society under Capt. Harry Idle on December 1, in a programme that included Coleridge-Taylor's 'Othello' Suite and the Prelude to Colin MacLeod Campbell's opera 'Thais and Talmaæ.'

The enterprising Wanstead Choral and Orchestral Society (Mr. Leslie Regan) chose Purcell's 'Dido and Æneas' and Dale's 'Before the paling of the stars' as the chief works in its programme of December 1.

To celebrate the fifty-first season of the People's Concert Society a Symphony concert was given at Battersea Town Hall on Sunday, December 2. A professional orchestra played the 'New World' Symphony and, with Miss Marjorie Hayward, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

Dartford Choral Society (Mr. Ernest Leeds) opened its season on December 4 with 'A Tale of Old Japan.'

Eltham Choral Society (Mr. Cyril V. Jenkins) performed 'The Song of Hiawatha' on December 4. Muswell Hill Institute Choral Society (Mr. Swidenbank) had given the same work a few days previously. Parts 1 and 2 were sung on December 6 by West Middlesex Musical Society (Mr. C. Stanley Smallman).

The choir of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church Hall, Battersea Rise, gave 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' on December 12, under the direction of Miss Emma Ware.

An ambitious programme consisting of Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' and Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter' was undertaken by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society at its December concert, under Mr. Leslie Regan.

At a concert given at Blackheath by Miss Ethel Waddington the Rondel Singers sang a quartet from Kennedy Scott's 'Music for a Nativity Play' and Brahms's 'Marienlieder.'

Bax's Quartet for oboe and strings was played at a concert of the Blackheath branch of the B.M.S.

Mr. Norman Askew, organist and musical director of Southfields Central Hall, made his first appearance as conductor of the Wimbledon (1914) Choral Society on January 15. The programme included Parry's 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' the 'Figaro' and 'Rosamunde' Overtures, madrigals, and part-songs.

Music in the Provinces

BIRMINGHAM.—During the last few concerts of the year the City Orchestra, under Dr. Boult, played a Symphony of C. Ph. E. Bach in D, three Concertos by Bach for two pianos (Miss Myra Hess and Mr. Harold Samuel), Holst's 'Beni-Mora' Suite, W. H. Reed's Rhapsody for viola and orchestra (Mr. Bernard Shore), Schubert's C minor Symphony, Elgar's 'In the South,' and Bach's fifty-sixth Cantata (Mr. Robert Maitland).

At the first concert of the New Year the orchestra played MacDowell's tone-poem 'The Saracens.'——Elgar's Pianoforte Quintet was played shortly before Christmas by Mr. Charles Kelly and the Philharmonic Quartet. This Quartet has also played Brahms in C minor and two movements from a Quartet by Turina, and at Bournville took part in the Brahms Sextet and the Schubert Quintet in C.——The first chamber-music concert of the New Year was given by the Dorian Trio from Bangor; they played, among other things, a set of Variations and a Scherzo by Hubert Davies.——The Catterall Quartet played Dohnányi's Op. 7 for the Chamber Concerts Society on January 8.

BOSTON (Lincs.).—The Choral Society sang Brahms's 'Requiem' on December 13 in the Parish Church, with accompaniment of organ and drums. Mr. George Gray was the organist and Dr. Bernard Jackson conducted.

BRADFORD.—The works of Delius are still being made known in the composer's native town by Mr. Keith Douglas. The 'Cello Concerto was repeated, under his direction, at a recent Sunday concert with Miss Beatrice Harrison as soloist, and the Pianoforte Concerto was played by Mr. Edgar Knight a few weeks later. The programme on this occasion also included Scriabin's first Symphony and Brahms's second.——The Hallé Orchestra, in two visits under Sir Hamilton Harty, played Dvorák's fourth Symphony, Mozart's G minor, and a suite of string pieces by Bossi, entitled 'Goldoniani.'——The concerts of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra, suspended during last season, have been resumed under Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

BRISTOL.—On December 17 the Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Arnold Barter, gave the following varied and excellent programme: The Suite of Purcell's pieces arranged for strings by Albert Coates, Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis, Bach's Cantata 'Come, Redeemer of our race,' two excerpts from Holst's music to Masefield's mystery play 'The Coming of Christ,' Bach's Violin Concerto in E, played by Isolde Menges, and Handel's second Organ Concerto, played by Mr. Ralph T. Morgan.

COVENTRY.—The Schubert Centenary was celebrated by Coventry Corporation Educational Department Symphony Orchestra, on December 15, under Mr. George Williams, the chief work in the programme being the Symphony in C minor.

DERBY.—Dr. Vaughan Williams conducted the performance of his 'Sea Symphony' given by the Choral Union on December 18. The soloists were Mr. Roy Henderson and Miss Hilda Blake. The Symphony was followed by Hamilton Harty's 'The Mystic Trumpeter,' which Sir Henry Coward conducted.

DURHAM.—It has been decided to form a musical club with Mr. R. R. Kimbell, of Bede College, as musical director.

GLOUCESTER.—The concert edition of 'Semele' was performed by the Choral Society on January 10 under Mr. H. W. Sumsion, the principal parts being sung by Miss Alice Moxon, Miss Gladys Palmer, Mr. Trefor Jones, and Mr. Stuart Robertson.

HUDDERSFIELD.—A recent programme given by the Glee and Madrigal Society under Dr. T. E. Pearson included the Sanctus from Bach's Mass in B minor, Alison's madrigal 'Shall I abide this jesting?' and Caldicott's glee 'Winter Days.'——The Brosa Quartet played Bach's Quartet for the Music Club on January 9.

LEEDS.—'The Mill,' a movement from a Quartet by Raff, was included in the programme given by the Yorkshire String Quartet at the Bohemian Chamber Concert on January 9.——The Entr'acte from Delius's 'A Village Romeo and Juliet' was played under Mr. Julius Harrison at the concert of the Leeds Symphony Orchestra on January 12.——At the recent performance of 'Semele' by the Philharmonic Society the bass soloist, whose name we accidentally omitted in our last issue, was Mr. Albert Murgatroyd.

LIVERPOOL.—At a recent Sunday Chamber concert Honegger's 'King David' was performed by a choir of eighteen under Dr. J. E. Wallace. Mr. Basil Maine was the narrator, and the instrumental part was played at the pianoforte by Mr. Norman Suckling, whose one-Act opera, 'A Vision of Avalon,' was given, in a concert version, on the same evening.——Dr. Malcolm Sargent conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra in John Ireland's 'Mai Dun,' Dvorák's fourth Symphony, Stravinsky's 'Fire-Bird' Suite, and Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis.——A notice of the performances of 'A Soldier's Tale' and 'The Golden Goose' will be found on p. 163.——The Philharmonic Society's concert on January 15 was conducted by Karl Alwin, of the Vienna State Opera. His programme, which was finely delivered, included the 'Eroica' Symphony, Ravel's 'La Valse,' and 'Dance Variations' by Clemens von Franckenstein.——The Catterall Quartet played Ernest Walker's Fantasia at a Rodewald concert.

MANCHESTER.—The following works have been performed at recent Hallé concerts: Debussy's 'Fêtes' and 'Nuages,' the Suite of Purcell pieces arranged by Bliss, Medtner's second Pianoforte Concerto (played by the composer), the Sinfonia for oboe and strings from Bach's 'Easter Oratorio,' C. Ph. E. Bach's Sinfonia No. 2, in E flat, Honegger's 'Chant de Joie,' V. Hely-Hutchinson's Variations, Intermezzo, Scherzo, and Finale, Beethoven's Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello, Sibelius's 'En Saga,' Eric Fogg's 'June Twilight,' and 'The Messiah.'——'The Golden Legend' was sung by Bolton Choral Union under Sir Hamilton Harty at the Municipal concert on January 7.——A season rich in chamber-music performance has brought Beethoven's B flat Quartet, Frank Bridge's Fantasy Trio in C minor, a Cortot-Thibaud-Casals programme, Schubert's String Quintet, Bax's 'Cello Sonata, Prokofiev's fifth Pianoforte Sonata, Pierné's Pianoforte Quintet (the last three at one concert), a Trio in D by F. Laloux, Tchaikovsky's Quartet in F, and a Brahms programme by the Catterall Quartet.——'The Messiah' was also given at a Brand Lane concert.——The Fellowship Orchestra, with a mixed professional and amateur membership, is being resuscitated under the direction of Mr. F. J. Klink.——Mr. Harold Dawber conducted the Manchester Vocal Society on January 16 in a programme that included madrigals and Bach's 'Praise the Lord.'

NEWCASTLE.—At the December concert of Armstrong College Choral and Orchestral Societies Dr. Whittaker conducted Brahms's 'Requiem' and the 'Eroica' Symphony.——The programme of the Bach Choir, also under Dr. Whittaker, included two works given for the first time at Newcastle—Holst's Choral Ballet 'The Golden Goose' and Vaughan Williams's 'Flos Campi.' The 'Concerto Accademico' was played by Mr. Alfred Wall.——The Symphony Orchestra's programme on December 12 included Vaughan Williams's 'London' Symphony, under Sir Henry Wood.——Capt. H. G. Amers, who has been appointed musical director of the Newcastle Exhibition, conducted the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union in 'Caractacus' and 'Blest Pair of Sirens' on December 19. Capt. Amers's father, the late Mr. J. H. Amers, was musical director at the Newcastle Jubilee Exhibition in 1887.

NORWICH.—The new Cathedral organist, Dr. Heathcote Statham, made his debut as director of the Philharmonic Society on December 10, in a programme that included the 'New World' Symphony.

PENZANCE.—Dvorák's fourth Symphony and Smetana's 'Vltava' were played at a concert given by the Penzance Orchestral Society, fifty strong, under the direction of Mr. Walter Barnes.

PETERBOROUGH.—The Choral Union and Orchestral Society gave a joint concert under Mr. Armstrong at the Corn Exchange on December 8. Miss Mary Burgess played Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto, and the choral items included Gibbons's 'The Silver Swan' and part-songs by Stanford, Holst, and Bantock.

PLYMOUTH.—At the Orchestral Society's opening concert of the season Franck's Symphony and MacDowell's D minor Pianoforte Concerto, with Miss Louie Bawden as soloist, were given under Mr. Walter Weekes for the first time at Plymouth.——Mr. Henry Woodward's Ladies' Choir took part in the Corporation Concert at the Guildhall on December 8, and sang Julius Harrison's 'The Blessed Damozel,' the test-piece in which this choir was recently successful at Blackpool.

READING.—The performance of 'Samson' given by the Reading Philharmonic Society under Mr. P. R. Scrivener on December 12 was notable not only for the excellent work of the choir, but for the good qualities that distinguished the solo singing of Miss Marie Howes, Miss Janet Powell, Mr. Percy Manchester, and Mr. Walter Saull. A week later the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. E. O. Daughtry, played Elvey's 'Festal March' and Schubert's third Symphony, a work that is rarely heard even during a centenary.

Ross (Hereford).—The musical societies that operate in this neighbourhood now include the Ross Orpheus Society, a newly-formed male-voice choir under Mr. F. G. Parsons, organist of the Ross Parish Church. The choir made a good impression at its first concert shortly before Christmas.

RUSHDEN.—'A Tale of Old Japan' was the principal work in a concert given by the Choral Society under Mr. William Wright.

RYDE.—The Philharmonic Society formerly connected with the Corporation, but now independent, opened its new career with performances of 'King Olaf' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' under the direction of E. G. Welch.

SHEFFIELD.—The programme of the fiftieth mid-day recital at the University included music of the 17th and 18th centuries, and Byrd's Fantasia for String Sextet. Mr. William Smith conducted. ——Bax's Violin Sonata in E was played at one of these recitals by Mr. Laurance Turner and Mrs. Leathes.——A programme of music for three or four 'cellos, arranged for the Music Club by Mr. Alan Morton, included a 'Cello Quartet by Kousnetzof and works by de la Tombelle, Krein, Fitzhagen, and Popper.——Sir Henry Coward conducted the Musical Union's twenty-eighth performance of 'The Messiah' on December 13.

SHREWSBURY.—Brahms's second Symphony was played at a concert of the Orchestral Society under Mr. F. C. Morris.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The Philharmonic Society opened its thirty-fifth season with a performance of Handel's 'Samson.' Mr. Ronald Dussek conducted, and the principals were Miss Mabel Ritchie, Miss Mona Benson, Mr. Emlyn Bebb, Mr. Richard Watson, and Mr. John Solomon.——The newly-formed Southampton Male-Voice Choir gave a successful inaugural concert, with Mr. Arnold Williams as conductor.——The Southampton Musical Society, under Mr. Arnold Williams, gave two performances of 'The Messiah' at the Central Hall in mid-December.

SOUTHEND.—The programme with which the Southend Symphony Orchestra opened its winter season under Mr. G. H. Ingram included Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, Elgar's Serenade for Strings, and a Fugue in A by the conductor.

SOUTHPORT.—The Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. J. E. Matthews, mustered seventy players for its first concert of the season, at which the programme included Brahms's 'Academic Festival' Overture, Grainger's 'Colonial Song,' Moussorgsky's Persian Dance from 'Khovantchina,' and Beethoven's third Pianoforte Concerto, played by Mr. Levitsky.

STOCKPORT.—A recent programme of the Stockport Vocal Union included Morley's 'Fire, Fire,' Cornelius's 'So soft and warm' and 'Love, I give myself to thee,' and Vaughan Williams's Five English Folk-Songs. Dr. T. Keighley conducted.

TAUNTON.—At the first concert given by the Madrigal Society under its new conductor, Mr. Herbert Knott, the programme included two 16th-century madrigals arranged by Mr. H. A. Jeboult, the late conductor of the Society.——The Choral Society, also under Mr. Herbert Knott, chose 'The Song of Miriam' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' for the opening concert of its twenty-first season.

WIGAN.—The new Wigan Symphony Orchestral Society gave its first concert on January 16. Ninety players took part, and the conductor was Mr. William Benson.

WINCHESTER.—A Schubert programme was given by the Music Club, under Dr. Dyson, with the help of the choirs of Shawford, St. Cross, and Winchester City, and of orchestral players from London. The choir sang, in addition to Schubert choral pieces, Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.'

WINDSOR.—A typical programme was given by Windsor and Eton Choral Society in December, under the direction of the Rev. B. C. S. Everett. The music included 'Semele,' Holst's 'Hymns from the Rig Veda,' Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region,' and Brahms's D minor Violin Sonata, played by Miss Sybil Eaton and Sir Walford Davies.

WOKING.—Dame Ethel Smyth conducted the Musical Society in a programme which consisted largely of her works. The choral numbers included 'Laggard Dawn' and 'Dreaming.'

YORK.—The new abridged version of 'Semele' was given by the York Musical Society under Dr. Bairstow. The principal parts were sung by Miss Hilda Blake, Miss Dorothy d'Orsay, Mr. Arthur Jordan, and Mr. Albert Murgatroyd.

LIVERPOOL REPERTORY OPERA

The Liverpool Repertory Opera a short while ago paid London a compliment by advertising itself as 'Liverpool's Old Vic.' In the five short years that have gone since the movement started, the progress has been so rapid that the sub-title has now been discarded and with perfect justice, for the compliment would no longer be deserved. The 'Old Vic.' has never attempted Stravinsky's 'The Soldier's Tale' and Holst's 'The Golden Goose,' performed by the Liverpool company on January 11 with some éclat and with a general competence that went far beyond our expectation. Neither work gives much scope for singers, but the orchestral playing under Mr. John Tobin and the production by Mr. David L. Webster deserved the highest praise.

Both works excited unusual interest. 'The Soldier's Tale' needs no description. It is a long tale and it would be a witty tale. Wit and inordinate length, however, are mutually exclusive. The Liverpool audience found it mildly amusing—which is likely to be the first verdict of every intelligent and alive audience. But it is a verdict closer acquaintance tends to modify. This soldier is a slow, witless fellow; he takes an unconscionable time to go to the devil. Dramatically, the story is dead against all verisimilitude. How could any self-respecting demon spend so much time to win so dull a soul?

Holst's 'Golden Goose' is a very different affair. It is just the sort of opera to be passed lightly over simply because of its straightforward, easy, unpretentious style. Probably Holst himself would not give it high rank amongst his works. And yet, in my opinion, it should go like hot cakes, if for no other reason than that it does what it sets out to do to perfection. It owes nothing to foreign models. Although founded on a tale of Grimm's it is as English as 'The house that Jack built' or 'This little pig went to market.' The lively music carries the action along lightly and at a good pace. The mummers' entertainment is good fun; what singing there is does not go beyond the range of intelligent, willing amateurs—an opera, then, which a professional company would find it easy to produce adequately without undertaking heavy burdens or grave responsibilities. Yet, no doubt, professionals will look askance at the 'Golden Goose,' just because it does not conform to the usual pattern. For my part I would rather have written 'The Golden Goose' than a thousand imitations of Tristan or Otello.

The Liverpool audience enjoyed every note of it—and so would any audience which had the privilege of hearing this fresh, deft music played with the gusto and spirit which characterised the performance in the David Lewis Theatre. F. B.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS

Conferences should always be stimulating, but sometimes they are the reverse. The success of a conference depends not only upon the agenda, but upon the attitude of those attending. An excellent agenda is useless unless there are keen debates, but if those who attend are anxious to learn and to be helpful, then, provided the agenda is a good one, the result is both stimulating and helpful to all concerned. 'Whether from pride or idleness, men prefer discussion to instruction,' wrote Méhul, when dedicating one of his operas to Cherubini, and it is when humility is substituted for pride that discussion and instruction ensue.

This is not to suggest that those members of the Society who attended the recent Conference were overburdened with humility, but they were anxious to discuss the matters put before them with a view of helping in every possible way to develop the activities of the Society under its new constitution.

An excellent printed Agenda was a feature of the Conference. This Agenda contained all the Resolutions, together with the names of the speakers and the times at which they would speak. The value of this Agenda was apparent from the ease with which the Conference proceeded upon its work from day to day.

The members assembled at the Palace Hotel, Buxton, on Monday, December 31, and in the evening there was a Presidential reception.

On Tuesday, January 1, the Mayor and Corporation of Buxton extended to the Society an official welcome. The address of the Mayor to the members was excellent both in form and substance, and formed a good prelude to the Presidential address of Dr. Adrian Boult.

The Presidential address, as is usual on such occasions, ranged from China to Peru in a wide survey of the conditions under which music is practised both by professional and amateur. It asked certain questions, such as—Why are we musicians? What is the impulse that drives people to enter the musical profession?—and, in answering them most effectively, took the opportunity to suggest that membership of the profession brought with it certain obligations and public responsibilities.

The President also alluded to the remarkable list of new members who had been enrolled since the details of the reconstitution of the Society had been made public. He concluded by reminding members that their first duty was to uphold not only the honour and dignity of musicians, but, more important still, the honour and dignity of music.

The debate on the Presidential address which followed was both interesting and stimulating.

In proposing the resolution on the Agenda, 'The particular object of the Society being the consolidation of the profession of music in the best interests of music and musicians,' Dr. Whittaker stated that the interests of the public and of the profession were undoubtedly single and indivisible, and that a musical profession which was not adequately organized was a danger to the public under modern conditions. After referring to modern developments such as the mechanical reproduction of music, which had advanced with such remarkable rapidity in this generation, no man knowing what problems would arise in connection with it or in what way the musical profession would be called upon to aid, he stated how essential it was that the Society should attach every branch of the profession: the teacher, whether working privately or in an institution, the soloist or member of an orchestra, conductor, composer, critic, author—for the effect which a powerful and representative body imparted to its individual members was something which could not be expressed in definite terms, but was, nevertheless, real.

After an excellent debate, in which many members took part, Sir Hugh Allen, as Chairman, before putting the resolution to the meeting suggested that all must work to make the Society a strong and influential factor in the world of music. Humble and proud must work together, for in building for others we built for ourselves; in working for others we developed our own characters; and the good estate of the society to which we belonged depended upon the character of its members.

On Wednesday morning, the annual general meeting of the Society was held, and in the afternoon the new Council, elected under the new constitution, held its first meeting and elected an Executive Committee.

After the council meeting, the Conference considered the motion on the Agenda referring to the provision of a common form of Agreement for organist members. The secretary explained that this motion was placed on the Agenda in order to give the members an opportunity of discussing the matter. It was recognised that it was a most difficult question, as the legal status of organists had yet to be defined.

Mr. Bernard Johnson opened the discussion, mentioning that in any form of Agreement, definite details were necessary, and the object of the discussion was to obtain the views of members with regard to these details.

The Chairman, Dr. Frederick G. Shinn, in summing up the discussion, was most informative with regard to the action taken by the Royal College of Organists some years ago when the College interviewed the Archbishop of Canterbury with reference to the position, or legal status, of the organist.

On Thursday morning an interesting debate had been arranged on the subject of the co-ordination and extension of music as a subject of education in all forms of schools. The committee had arranged for Sir Henry Hadow to open the discussion, but unfortunately he was unable to attend on account of ill-health, and the secretary submitted a memorandum giving particulars regarding the facilities at present existing in all kinds of schools.

That this question was one of the most important with which the profession had to deal was evident from the interest taken in the debate and the number of members who spoke. The Conference finally referred the matter to the Society's Executive Committee to consider how best the policy referred to in the resolution could be carried out.

In the afternoon, Mr. Robert McLeod gave a well-informed and interesting lecture on 'Class Singing,' and on Friday morning the Conference closed with a lecture by Mr. Tobias Matthay on 'The Slur, or couplet of notes, in all its variety, its interpretation and execution.'

It is not possible to refer to the many events of a social character which were arranged during the week. Mr. Claud Biggs gave two pianoforte recitals, both largely consisting of works by Bach and Scarlatti.

Those who attended the Conference looked back to it with great pleasure. All present were obviously alive to their responsibilities under the new régime and to the possibilities of the future.

That the Council also realises its responsibilities at this juncture in the affairs of the Society is evident from the fact that one of its first duties was to appoint an Executive Committee, which has already met on two occasions and appointed various sub-committees to deal with certain special matters.

We can only wish the Society success under its new constitution—a success which will undoubtedly affect all those who practise music as a profession.

MUSIC IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Bedford Modern.—On November 28 the choir gave Julius Harrison's 'Christmas Cantata' in St. Paul's Church, three of the four soloists being boys in the School. For the rest of the programme César Franck was mainly drawn upon: Mr. H. J. Colson played the 'Pièce Héroïque' and the third Choral; and a string quartet led by Mr. A. de Reyghere played the Larghetto from the Quartet in D. The Christmas concert consisted of Part 1 of 'The Creation,' carols, and miscellaneous solos. Mr. H. J. Colson conducted.

Berkhamsted.—The House singing and instrumental competition was adjudicated by Dr. J. W. Ivimey (Marlborough). The singing test-piece was Dunhill's arrangement of 'The Keel Row.' P. Cory, who left the School a year ago, has won the Bach Scholarship at the R.A.M. A concert has been given by the John Fry String Quartet, assisted by Mr. John Booth. At the end-of-term concert, 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' was given, and the orchestral works played were Hamish MacCunn's Overture, 'Land of the Mountain and the Flood,' Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, and Elgar's fourth 'Pomp and Circumstance' March. The programme included also a pianoforte concerto and a pianoforte trio, both played by boys in the School. A weekly Singing Practice for the whole school has been instituted.

Blundell's.—The Christmas concert consisted of Bach's Magnificat, Purcell's 'Let my prayer come up,' Holst's Psalm 148, and the Pastoral Symphony from the 'Christmas Oratorio.' Mr. J. G. Elliot Hall conducted. The other major event of the year was a concert of madrigals and string music.

Bruton (King's School).—The Choral Society gave Parts 1 and 2 of 'The Creation' in the Parish Church on December 14. The tenor and bass soloists were old Brutonians now in residence at Cambridge: J. R. G. Harris (choral exhibitioner of Emmanuel) and M. Synge (choral scholar of King's). The Rev. A. H. Peppin was at the organ. At the end-of-term concert the orchestra played Haydn's 'London' Symphony, the rest of the programme being miscellaneous. Mr. N. W. Newell conducted both performances.

Bryanston School (Dorset).—Three chamber-music concerts have been given, devoted respectively to César Franck (the Violin Sonata and the Prelude, Choral, and Fugue); Schubert (the D major Pianoforte Sonata and songs); and modern British composers (songs by Quilter, Vaughan Williams, and Wood, and pianoforte pieces by Armstrong Gibbs). The final concert of the term consisted mainly of Christmas music, including Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols.'

Canford.—Various concerts of string quartets and instrumental solos have been given on Sunday evenings. Part of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was sung on December 2, and a concert of carols was given (and broadcast) on December 17 under Mr. S. B. Leonard. Mr. Leonard has lectured on Schubert; and the House competitions have been held, the adjudicator being Mr. S. H. Braithwaite.

Dover College.—At the summer concert the orchestra played Haydn's 'Emperor' Variations and the Intermezzo from Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite, and accompanied the Choral Society in Armstrong Gibbs's 'Beyond the Spanish Main.' Other choral items were Martin Shaw's 'Cargoes' and Armstrong Gibbs's 'The Emigrant'; and the Junior School Chorus sang 'Sumer is i-cumen in' and 'The Twelve Days of Christmas.'

Eton.—Events of the term have included two organ recitals by Dr. Ley; recitals by Miss Jelly d'Aranyi, and by Mr. John Goss and the Cathedral Male-Voice Quartet; vocal and instrumental competitions (adjudicated by Dr. Basil Johnson and Mr. Armstrong Gibbs); and performances of carols in the College Chapel. The Windsor and Eton Choral Society has given two concerts, singing the Brahms 'Requiem' at the first, and Handel's 'Semele' and Vaughan Williams's 'Towards the Unknown Region' at the second. On St. Andrew's Day an especially interesting concert was given of compositions by Old Etonians, performed by Old Etonians. The list of composers was as follows: Arne, Butterworth, Goodhart, Hely-Hutchinson, Kelly, Parry, Price-Jones, Quilter. The principal choral items at the Musical Society's concert were Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and three of Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea'; the orchestral items being the 'Magic Flute' Overture, the first movement of the 'Unfinished,' and the 'Peer Gynt' Suite. Dr. Ley conducted.

Felsted.—At the winter concert the Glee Club sang Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah' (with orchestra) and part-songs by Purcell ('Sound the Trumpet'), Vaughan Williams, Coleridge-Taylor, and Schumann. The orchestra played Grainger's 'Country Gardens,' part of Handel's 'Water Music,' and two Norwegian Dances by Grieg. Solos, vocal and instrumental, school songs, and shanties completed the programme, which was conducted by Mr. G. H. Thorne. At an orchestral concert given by the Harlesden Philharmonic Society under Mr. F. W. Greenfield, Mr. Thorne played the first movement of the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, the programme also including the first two movements of the Schubert Symphony in C. Community singing and chamber concerts have also taken place during the term.

Giggleswick.—The chief choral items in the programme of the Christmas concert were Jacobson's Fantasia on 'The Beggar's Opera' and three of Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' boys taking the solos. Groups of carols and shanties were also sung, and the orchestra played Grieg's 'Sigurd Jorsalfar' Suite. Pianoforte and vocal solos formed the remainder of the programme.

Lancing.—The vocal part of the winter concert consisted of madrigals, folk-songs, carols, and vocal solos. The orchestra played Saint-Saëns's 'Danse Macabre' and the second 'Brandenburg' Concerto, the flute and trumpet solos in the latter being played by boys. Mr. A. Brent-Smith conducted.

Loretto.—Choral Fantasias on 'Tannhäuser' and 'Faust' have been sung by a choir consisting of practically the whole School, with orchestra. The Christmas Music from 'The Messiah' has been sung in Chapel. Recitals have been given during the term by the Scottish String Quartet and Mr. T. Sterndale Bennett.

Malvern.—At the School concert on December 11 the greater part of 'The Messiah' was sung under Mr. J. A. Davison, who has also given three lectures and three organ recitals. A Schubert concert included the Trio in B flat and songs sung by Miss Sibyl Cropper; another concert, String Quartets by Beethoven (Op. 18, No. 5) and Schubert (A minor). On December 13 a miscellaneous concert was provided, partly by boys, partly by the staff. The Christmas concert, also miscellaneous, contained items performed by Old Malvernians and by the Masters' Male-Voice Choir; masters' quartets, part-songs by the Choral Society, and orchestral movements of Handel, Mozart, and Bach. Among the part-songs or quartets were the anonymous 'Death of the Cardinal' (edited by Philip Heseltine), Vaughan Williams's 'Wassail Song,' and Herbert Hughes's 'Doctor Foster.'

Oundle.—The work chosen for this term's performance was the 'Christmas Oratorio.' Parts 1 to 3 were given complete, with certain numbers from the remainder, including all but two of the chorales and choruses; and part of the performance was broadcast. The total time spent on rehearsals during the term was sixty-two hours. There were 276 in the chorus, 281 in the 'non-choir,' and 57 in the orchestra. All but nine players (including Messrs. Charles Woodhouse and Leon Goossens) were members of the School; and boys played the solo flute and first and second Bach trumpets. Mr. C. M. Spurling conducted. On October 15 a chamber concert was given by the Marie Wilson String Quartet and Mr. Henry Bronk. The programme consisted of Beethoven's first 'Rasoumovsky' Quartet, Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet, and the Schubert Quartet in D minor.

Rugby.—At the School concert the choir sang two of Elgar's 'Songs from the Bavarian Highlands.' The orchestra played the Overture to the 'Occasional Oratorio,' the Ballet Music from 'Rosamunde,' and Elgar's fourth 'Pomp and Circumstance' March. Other items were the Bach Aria on the G string for 'cellos and organ, the Chopin Scherzo in B flat minor, and the Saint-Saëns Variations for two pianofortes on a Theme of Beethoven. Mr. K. A. Stubbs conducted. At the O.T.C. Band concert Mr. J. J. McKinnell played Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia with the orchestral accompaniment arranged for military band; movements of Beethoven's Trio in F for flute, bassoon, and pianoforte, and of the Schubert Octet, were also given. Schubert's 'Marche Militaire,' Tchaikovsky's Rêverie, and a selection from 'The Yeomen of the Guard' completed the programme, which was conducted by Mr. H. W. Pearce.

St. Paul's.—At the Musical Society's concert two works by Holst for choir and orchestra were given—'Christmas Day' and 'King Estmere.' The orchestra played the first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony, and among the other items were Chopin's Ballade No. 4 and Elgar's 'Fly, singing bird' and 'The Snow.' Mr. H. E. Wilson conducted. At other concerts during the term organ solos have been played by the Rev. N. C. Woods (O.P.) and Mr. T. L. Martin, the programmes also including part-songs and miscellaneous items contributed by Old Paulines, the staff, and present members of the School.

Stamford.—At the Spring (1928) concert the orchestra played Moussorgsky's 'Gopak' and Tchaikovsky's 'Valse des Fleurs.' The Junior Choir sang Ireland's 'I have twelve oxen' and Frank Bridge's 'Pan's Holiday.' The first movement of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor was played, and A. M. Smith's choral setting of Kingsley's 'Ode to the North-East Wind' was sung—both with orchestral accompaniment. At the summer concert Dunhill's 'Tubal Cain' was the principal item. The orchestra played various numbers from German's music for 'Much Ado about Nothing' and from Grieg's 'Holberg Suite.' On December 16 a programme of carols was given in St. John's Church. Mr. Harry Brook conducted on all three occasions.

Sutton Valence.—The choral part of the Christmas concert consisted of four numbers from the Bach Magnificat, part-songs by Wood and Vaughan Williams, Balfour Gardiner's 'Sir Eglamore,' and community songs. Mr. S. L. Russell conducted. Members of the Maidstone Amateur Orchestral Society, who formed the orchestra, played Grainger's 'Handel in the Strand,' under Mr. S. Collingwood. The 'school' solos included the Brahms Rhapsody in G minor; and Mr. J. A. Robinson, of the L.S.O., played violin solos by Bach and Paganini.

Uppingham.—At the School concert 'The Revenge' was sung (by heart); and the orchestra played the 'Rosamunde' Overture and the Finale of Haydn's 'London' Symphony. At the 'Musics,' which alternate with school lectures, there have been a practice of new hymns; a lecture-recital on 'The growth of pianoforte music up to Chopin'; a 'Concert by the Audience'; a Schubert concert, including the String Quartet in A minor; and one of solos for pianoforte (Schumann's 'Carnaval'), violin, and 'cello. Carols were sung in Chapel on the last Sunday of the term. At recitals to voluntary audiences Trios by Schubert (B flat), Schumann ('Phantasiestücke'), and Boughton have been played; a pianoforte recital and a talk on the Salzburg Festival of 1928 have also been given. There have been ten informal concerts on Friday mornings; and the School Music Society has had papers on Russian Music, the 'Development of the Orchestra,' and 'The Magic Flute.'

Westminster.—An informal concert on October 29 included solos for flute, violin and pianoforte, songs, and pianoforte duets. Part 1 of 'The Messiah' and the 'Hallelujah Chorus' were given on November 30 under Mr. C. Thornton Lofthouse, the whole school taking part in four of the choruses, and the first flute and first trumpet parts being played by boys. Contingents from the School have attended Mr. Robert Mayer's Orchestral Concerts for Children, which are given on Saturday mornings in Central Hall and conducted by Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

Worksop College.—The term's music has included a violin recital by Miss Jessie Hinchcliffe, and a recital of Old English songs and ballad opera scenas by Miss Dorothy d'Orsay and Mr. Frederick Woodhouse. Incidental music to a performance of 'Twelfth Night' was supplied by a School string quartet on the stage as the Duke's Musicians. The music was chiefly Elizabethan, the two songs for which no music has survived being set by Mr. H. H. Wintersgill. The programme of the end-of-term concert included a Haydn Trio, a Pianoforte Sonata by Beethoven, movements from the Handel Violin Sonata in A, and the Brahms 'Cello Sonata in E minor.

Music in Scotland

Aberdeen.—At the first of the Subscription concerts the Oratorio Choir, under Mr. Wilhan Swainson, sang Parry's 'Ode on the Nativity' and Elgar's 'The Challenge of Thor.'

Bathgate.—Bathgate and District Choral Union (conductor, Mr. A. G. Peggie) gave its annual performance of 'The Messiah.'

Dalkeith.—Dalkeith Choral Union performed Mendelssohn's Cantata, 'Lauda Sion,' Mr. Gregory M. Keppie, Edinburgh, conducting.

Dunbar.—Dunbar Choral Union gave a performance of 'The Messiah,' Mr. Alfred Mann conducting.

Edinburgh.—The programmes of the Paterson Orchestral concerts (Scottish Orchestra) were run on the same general lines as those of the Choral and Orchestral Union at Glasgow, noticed below. Mr. Vladimir Golschmann and Mr. van Raalte conducted.——At the first of the Reid Orchestral concerts (Prof. Tovey) the programme included Haydn's 'L'Ours' Symphony and Tchaikovsky's 'Pathétique.' The second was a Schubert Centenary concert, with the 'Weiberverschwörung' Overture and the Grand Duo in C (scored for orchestra by Joachim), both announced as for the first time in Scotland, and the Schubert-Liszt 'Wanderer' Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra. At the third concert the American composer-pianist, Mr. John Powell, played his own 'Negro Rhapsody' and the Beethoven C minor Concerto, and the Reid Orchestra, under Prof. Tovey, played Brahms's second Symphony. At the fourth concert, the Reid Orchestra, under Prof. Tovey, played Dvorák's Symphony in D minor, Bach's fourth 'Brandenburg' Concerto, the Haydn-Brahms Variations, Weber's 'Euryanthe' Overture, and Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture.——The series of five Reid Historical concerts at Edinburgh University is mainly devoted this season to the String Quartets of Haydn, but Prof. Tovey took advantage of the presence at Edinburgh of the Klingler String Quartet to add an extra concert, at which his own Pianoforte Quintet in E minor, Op. 14, a Haydn Quartet, and Beethoven's B flat Quartet, Op. 131 (with the original Finale), were played.——Prof. Tovey's Sunday concerts included performances by the Reid Orchestra of Brahms's B flat Pianoforte Concerto, Beethoven's fifth Symphony, Purcell's 'Gordian Knot' Suite for strings, the Bach D minor Pianoforte Concerto, a Handel Concerto Grosso in A, and a Schubert orchestral programme; an 'Armistice' programme in conjunction with the choir of St. Giles's Cathedral; a Schubert chamber-music programme which included the Octet and the 'Trout' Quintet; two pianoforte recitals by Prof. Tovey; a recital for two pianofortes in conjunction with Mr. John Powell; a Beethoven recital by Prof. Tovey, comprising three of the Pianoforte Sonatas, Op. 10, No. 3, Op. 90, and Op. 106; and a Handel and Mozart programme by the Reid Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Mary Grierson, which included Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 20, in F major, and Organ Concerto No. 2, in B flat (soloist, Mr. R. Howells), and Mozart's Symphony in E flat and Pianoforte Concerto in A major, K. 488 (soloist, Miss Grierson; conductor, Miss Margaret Ludwig).——The series of six lecture-concerts to school-children, given annually by Mr. Herbert Wiseman under the joint ægis of the Edinburgh Education Authority and Messrs. Paterson, included a Schubert orchestral programme, a song recital by Miss Helen Henschel, a Schubert programme of songs and instrumental trios, a talk on notation and architecture in music, a talk on appreciation, and, to wind up with, a full orchestral programme.——The programmes of four chamber concerts given by the Falconer String Quartet included, in addition to a number of standard classical works, a String Quartet by Prof. Tovey, Op. 24, in D, and Quartets by Vaughan Williams, Frank Bridge, and Dohnányi.——The Scottish String Quartet is also undertaking a series of four chamber concerts, and at the first of these played Quartets by Haydn, Tchaikovsky, and Frank Bridge.——The Klingler String Quartet, of Berlin, made a first appearance at Edinburgh, in Quartets by Haydn, Beethoven, Op. 131, and Schubert, Op. 161, and had a disappointing audience.——The Edinburgh Ladies' Trio gave a recital of Pianoforte Trios by Mozart, Schubert, and Mendelssohn.——Miss Seymour Whinyates (violin), Miss Joan Singleton (pianoforte), and Mr. Mark Raphael (baritone) gave a joint recital.——At the first meeting of the forty-first session of the Edinburgh Bach Society, the Church Cantatas 'Es ist dir gesagt' and 'Himmelskönig, sei willkommen,' and some Chorales were sung.——Edinburgh Choral Union gave its annual New Year's Day performance of 'The Messiah,' Mr. Greenhouse Allt conducting, and Mr. Watt Jupp leading the orchestra. In the evening, the Union's 'Scottish Choir' gave a concert of Scottish song.——At its first concert, the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society played Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture, Delius's 'On hearing the first cuckoo in spring,' Schubert's Symphony No. 5, in B flat, and Massenet's 'Scènes Pittoresques.' Mr. Ralph Langdon conducted, and also played the solo part in Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto No. 3, in C minor.——Mr. Moonie's Choir and the Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society joined forces in a performance of 'The Messiah,' Mr. Moonie conducting.——Mr. Godfrey's Choir (conductor, Mr. Gavin Godfrey) sang Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' and Holst's setting of the 148th Psalm.——Choral concerts were given by the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton) and the Edinburgh Gaelic Choir (Mr. Neil Orr).——At a public meeting called for the purpose, it was decided to form a Jewish Choral Union at Edinburgh.

Galashiels.—Galashiels Choral Society sang 'The Messiah,' Mr. Robert Barrow conducting.

Glasgow.—The programmes of the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union (Scottish Orchestra) included a performance of 'Elijah' by the Glasgow Choral Union, Mr. Wilfrid Senior conducting, Brahms's third Symphony, Beethoven's seventh Symphony, C minor Pianoforte Concerto, and Violin Concerto, Schubert's C major and B minor Symphonies, Berlioz's 'Chasse Royale,' Respighi's 'Concerto Gregoriano,' for violin and orchestra, and his 'Church Windows,' de Falla's 'Three-cornered Hat' Suite, W. T. Walton's 'Portsmouth Point' Overture, Glazounov's 'Stenka Razine,' Elgar's 'Falstaff,' Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, Delius's 'Dance Rhapsody,' Rachmaninov's second Pianoforte Concerto, Prokofiev's 'Love of the Three Oranges,' a Symphony in B flat, Op. 20, by Chausson, the 'Procession del Rocio,' by Turina, Mozart's eighth Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and Symphonies by Haydn and Mozart. Of the soloists, Iturbi, Solomon, and Boris Golschmann (pianists), Adila Fachiri and Szigeti (violinists), and Mabel Couper and Muriel Brunskill (vocalists), Iturbi and Szigeti, both of whom were appearing in Scotland for the first time, made a profound impression. Mr. Vladimir Golschmann, one of last season's conductors, was again brought from Paris to conduct. Why, with so many much better equipped native conductors to choose from, this should be so, is, frankly, quite beyond us. For the second month of the three months' season of the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union concerts Mr. Albert van Raalte, from the Royal Opera House, The Hague, succeeded Mr. Vladimir Golschmann as conductor, and with the advent of the much-awaited Prince, the Sleeping Beauty awoke to life. The programmes presented by Mr. van Raalte, certainly one of the best conductors the Scottish Orchestra has had in its thirty years' history, included: Symphonies—Beethoven's No. 3, in E flat, and No. 8, in F, Brahms's No. 1, in C minor, Schumann's No. 4, in D minor, Tchaikovsky's 'Pathétique,' Dvorák's 'From the New World,' and Dupré's Organ Symphony in G minor (soloist, M. Marcel Dupré); Overtures—Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3 and 'Coriolan,' Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave,' Brahms's 'Academic,' Smetana's 'Bartered Bride,' Rossini's 'William Tell,' Sullivan's 'Di Ballo,' Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' Dvorák's 'In der Natur,' Lalo's 'Le Roi d'Ys,' Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet,' and Wagner's 'Mastersingers,' 'Tannhäuser,' and 'Lohengrin'; Suites—Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne,' Delibes's 'Sylvia,' Holst's 'Perfect Fool,' Kodály's 'Hary Janos,' de Falla's 'El Amor Brujo,' and the Haydn-Brahms Variations; Concertos—Elgar's 'Cello Concerto (soloist, Mr. Sheridan Russell) and César Franck's 'Variations Symphoniques' (soloist, Mr. Petrie Dunn); miscellaneous—von Anrooij's 'Piet Hein,' Delius's 'Brigg Fair' and 'In a Summer Garden,' Honegger's 'Pastorale d'Eté,' Strauss's 'Till Eulenspiegel' and 'Death and Transfiguration,' Dukas's 'La Péri,' Pfitzner's 'Palestrina'; Preludes—Saint-Saëns's 'The Deluge,' Wagner's 'Siegfried Idyll,' and a number of Wagner excerpts. Madame Poolman-Meissner, from the Royal Opera House, The Hague, appeared at two of the concerts, and despite a vibrato of at times distressing proportions, sang with real distinction in both operatic arias and Lieder.——At the first chamber concert of the Glasgow Bach Society the Society's chamber orchestra (Mr. F. H. Bisset) played the 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 2, in F, Suite No. 1, in C, 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 5, in D, and the transcription in D minor for two violins and strings of the C minor Concerto for two pianofortes.——The programme of the December concert of the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton), which ran for three nights in the large St. Andrew's Hall, included Bantock's Hebridean 'Death Croon' and two groups of old Psalm-tunes from the early Scottish Psalters. The Glasgow Orpheus Choir also gave concerts at Hamilton, Stonehouse, and Ayr.——Mr. Roberton directed a large 'community singing' concert in St. Andrew's Hall for the Daily Express. The B.B.C. Glasgow Station Orchestra, assisted.——The Glasgow Choral Union and the Scottish Orchestra combined to give two performances of 'The Messiah,' Mr. Wilfrid Senior conducting.——At the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society's first concert, the orchestra played Beethoven's seventh Symphony, Stendale Bennett's 'Parisina' Overture, Elgar's 'Bavarian Dances,' and Johann Strauss's 'Gipsy Baron' Overture. Mr. Peebles Conn conducted. ——The choir and orchestra of the Glasgow Bach Society gave performances of the Christmas Oratorio, (Parts 1 and 2) and the Latin Magnificat in D, in Glasgow Cathedral. Mr. Henry Havergal conducted. An interesting feature was the inclusion of Bach trumpets and oboi d'amore in the orchestra.——The Elizabethan Choir (Mr. Percy Snowden) gave what was described as the first performance in Britain of a Mass in F (K. 192), by Mozart.——The choir of Belmont Church (Mr. H. G. Barrett) produced Schubert's Mass in F.——The Clements Ladies' Choir (Miss Mary Clements) gave a concert of part-songs.——Miss Amy Samuel (soprano), Miss Helen Young (violin), and Mr. Alfred Graham (pianoforte) gave a joint recital. ——The Wallace-Scott Orchestra, a south-side industrial combination, made a first public appearance.—— At a public meeting, Mr. F. H. Bisset presiding, it was resolved to form a Glasgow Chamber Music Society, for the purpose of stimulating chamber music and to organize concerts of the type hitherto promoted by the Glasgow Orpheus Choir.——Mrs. Marjory Kennedy Fraser gave two recitals of Hebridean songs.——Organ recitals were given at Glasgow University by Dr. Sydney Nicholson, Dr. Ernest Bullock, and Mr. A. M. Henderson.——The Glasgow Abstainers' Union showed enterprise in engaging Evelyn Scotney, Gota Ljunberg, Pampanini, and Mischa Levitzki for its autumn concerts.——The British Music Society (Glasgow centre) has failed to find a niche for itself in the musical life of Glasgow, and is talking of winding up.——M. Pouishnov gave a pianoforte recital at the Palette Club, the programme comprising the Bach Chaconne (transcribed), the Liszt Sonata, and Schumann's 'Carnaval.'——The Glasgow Y.M.C.A. Choir and the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society were associated in a performance of 'The Messiah,' Mr. W. N. Macquarrie directing.——A performance of 'The Messiah,' organized by the Glasgow Society of Organists and conducted by Mr. F. O. Sheard, was given by the combined choirs of a number of city churches.——A recital of Hebridean and Lowland Scots songs was given by Miss Amy Samuel, Mrs. Kenneth Galloway, and Mr. Hugh Mackay.

Hawick.—St. Cuthbert's Church Guild Choir (augmented) gave a performance of Brahms's 'Requiem,' Mr. Ernest A. Lumsden conducting.

Helensburgh.—At the first of the Helensburgh Subscription concerts, Mr. Philip Halstead (pianoforte) and associates played the Wind Quintets of Mozart and Beethoven, and other items.

Linlithgow.—Linlithgow Choral Union, under Mr. T. Finlay, Edinburgh, gave selections from 'The Messiah' and some Holst carols.

Paisley.—Paisley Choral Union (Dr. William Rigby) gave performances of Haydn's 'Spring' and the concert version of Gounod's 'Faust.'

Perth.—Perth Madrigal Society (conductor, Mr. David T. Yacamini), at its annual December concert presented an attractive and widely ranging programme of part-songs and madrigals.

Stirling.—The Stirling Arion Junior Choir (Mrs. Carruthers Greig) gave its third annual concert.

General.—Under the 'international celebrity' concerts scheme, concerts were given at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, and Stirling by Florence Austral and John Amadio, Chaliapin, Cortot, Casals, and Thibaud, and Paderewski.——Under the Max Mossel concerts scheme, Delia Reinhardt (vocalist) and Youra Guller (pianoforte), Jelly d'Aranyi (violin), John Goss (vocalist), and Orlov (pianoforte) appeared at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Ayr, and Bridge-of-Allan.—— Serge Diaghilev's Russian Ballet Company visited Glasgow and Edinburgh, devoting one week to each. Sir Thomas Beecham conducted on several evenings. ——The British National Opera Company, with a standard repertory which included Massenet's 'Manon,' Verdi's 'Falstaff,' and Rossini's 'Barber of Seville,' spent four weeks in Scotland, i.e., one each at Edinburgh and Aberdeen, and two at Glasgow.——Mr. Armstrong Gibbs lectured at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Perth, Forres, &c., for the Scottish Association for the Speaking of Verse, on 'The Relation between Music and Verse.' A number of his own songs were sung as illustrations.

Sebastian.

Music in Ireland

Belfast.—Two concerts of the Philharmonic Society call for record. One was of great importance, as it comprised a performance of Bantock's 'The Song of Songs.' The choir had been thoroughly trained in its work by Mr. E. Godfrey Brown, and the composer, who conducted, found good reason to be gratified by the occasion. The principal singers were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Mr. Trefor Jones, and Mr. Norman Allin. The second concert was a performance of 'The Messiah' under Mr. Brown, shortly before Christmas.——'Three Irish Pictures' by Dr. E. Norman Hay were produced under the composer's direction at a recent B.B.C. concert.

Dublin.—The most interesting of recent concerts was that given by the 2RN Orchestra at the Metropolitan Hall on December 15, under Mr. Vincent O'Brien. The programme included Beethoven's fourth Symphony, Grainger's 'Shepherd's Hey,' and other popular pieces, and the Phibsborough Choral Society sang madrigals under Mr. Wilfrid Brown.——'The Messiah' was performed by the Philharmonic Society under Mr. Turner Huggard on December 21 and 23. ——The Culwick Choral Society recently celebrated the twenty-fifth year of Mr. Percy Whitehead's conductorship with a programme of madrigals and part-songs.——Other interesting events of the winter season were the performance of the 'Christmas Oratorio' by the University Choral Society, under Dr. J. H. P. Hewson, and a Wagner concert by the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Col. Fritz Brase.—— Chamber music recitals were given by the London String Quartet; Cortot-Thibaud-Casals; and Madame Korchinska's Harp Ensemble.

Waterford.—'Elijah' was given by the Waterford Festival Choir in the Town Hall on December 13, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Herbert McClelland. The performance was broadcast from Dublin.

Music in Wales

Aberystwyth.—The weekly College concerts were resumed on January 10, when Schumann's and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintets were the chief items.

Bangor.—On December 6 the Choral and Orchestral Societies combined their forces under the direction of Mr. E. T. Davies in a programme that included the third 'Brandenburg' Concerto, Schubert's Symphony in C, and Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols.——Visitors to the Bangor Musical Club have included Mlle. Renée Chemet, M. Medtner in a programme of his own works, the Léner Quartet, and Miss Dorothy Silk.——Concerts for children, now in their fourth season, continue to flourish.——At University College eleven weekly concerts, covering a wide range of chamber music, were given during the Christmas term. The concerts were resumed on January 10, when the College Trio—Miss Kathleen Washbourne, Miss Enid Lewis, and Miss Pauline Taylor—played Schubert and Haydn and Mr. E T. Davies lectured on 'The Orchestra.'

Cardiff.—On December 11, at Crwys Road Welsh Calvinistic Church, a successful performance of the Christmas Oratorio was given to a crowded audience, under the direction of Mr. J. Charles McLean.——The autumn series of City Hall concerts concluded on December 2 with a choral concert in which the Cardiff Musical Society joined forces with the National Orchestra of Wales, under Mr. Warwick Braithwaite. The new season opened on January 11 with Brahms's 'Academic Festival' Overture and Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, and the auguries are favourable for a successful series.

HAWARDEN.—At the breaking-up of the County School in December, four choruses from Bach's B minor Mass were sung by the School choir and the Hawarden and District Choir, accompanied by the School orchestra. The head master, Mr. Arthur Lyon, conducted. It is intended to perform the complete work on March 6.

LLANELLY.—As a contribution to the Schubert Centenary celebrations, 'The Song of Miriam' was given by the Ebenezer Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Tawe Jones, together with a miscellaneous programme of vocal and orchestral selections.——The Music Committee of the forthcoming Eisteddfod has appointed Mr. Edgar Thomas, choirmaster of Zion Baptist Chapel, as conductor of the Eisteddfod Choir. The appointment is a popular one, as Mr. Thomas has done much to secure performances of works of a high standard, such as the 'St. Matthew' Passion, Dvorák's 'Stabat Mater,' and Parry's 'Judith.'

MORRISTON.—At the Tabernacle, on the evening of Boxing Day, Bach's Mass in B minor was performed under Mr. Edgar Hughson, with the assistance of Mr. T. J. Rees's orchestra. The principals were Miss Stiles-Allen, Miss Edith Furmedge, Mr. Parry Jones, and Mr. Robert Easton.

NEWTOWN.—The committee of the Newtown Festival has chosen the 'Hymn of Praise' and Haydn's 'The Seasons' as the chief works for the May Festival. Elgar's 'It comes from the misty ages' is among the smaller items selected.

PORTH.—On Christmas and Boxing Day the Porth Harmonic Society and Orchestra gave 'Elijah,' with admirable choral technique, under the conductorship of the veteran Mr. Rhys Evans. Mr. Horace Stevens sang the title-part, and Mr. T. Jenkins was at the organ.

WREXHAM.—On December 7 a Schubert Centenary concert was given by the Grove Park County School Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. F. P. Dodd. The programme included the 'Marche Militaire,' the Overture and Entr'actes from 'Rosamunde,' and the first movement of the B minor Symphony. Vocal items were also included. The orchestra comprised strings and a selection of players of wood-wind, brass, and drums, and consisted of forty-one players.

GERMANY

FRANZ SCHREKER'S LATEST OPERA

The prospect of a new opera by Franz Schreker rouses no excitement in those of us who have been disappointed by him so many times. The man whom Paul Bekker, when musical critic of the Frankfurter Zeitung, declared to be the true successor of Richard Wagner in the realm of opera, has, from the moment when his works arrived at Berlin, seen a decline of his glory which nobody would have expected. In the end, instead of being a provincial celebrity he came to be considered a mediocrity. The onward course of his career was interrupted by 'Irrelohe,' the first of his operas that was unable to win even a provincial public. Strangely enough, the musician who had been appointed director of the Berlin High School of Music had never had a first performance at Berlin.

'The Singing Devil,' the first performance of which took place on December 12, was intended to show a new side of Franz Schreker, since the style of his preceding works had proved rather compromising for him. The effects of colour by which he had tried to prove his artistic personality had lost their interest—all the more because some acute observers had noticed that there was very little substance behind them. Now, as a man of fifty, he felt it his duty to be sincere. Never before has he been so ascetic as in this score; his part-writing smacks half of Wagner, half of some of the younger musicians, who, up to that time, had nothing to do with Schreker. But in spite of his efforts, he has not convinced us that he has anything essential to say. As his own librettist he comes very near the Wagner of 'Parsifal,' a composer whom in the course of the last decade he seems to have studied. In avoiding his favourite effects he goes so far that he does not even employ them where they are justified by the situation—for instance, in a church scene, where, thanks to an organ, heathens are succumbing to Christians. The organ is the 'singing devil.' Alas, the devil does not sing loud enough to assure us of the victory of the Christians. Schreker has allotted to the chorus some passages which might prove effective, if he had not, in his asceticism, prevented this by an anticlimax.

The Berlin Staatsoper did its best to make 'The Singing Devil' attractive. The director himself acted as stage manager; Delia Reinhardt, Fritz Wolf (a new and promising tenor), and Friedrich Schorr were spokesmen of Schreker's cause.

HINDEMITH'S CONCERTO FOR VIOLA D'AMOUR AND ORCHESTRA

That Paul Hindemith is the most outstanding personality among the young German composers cannot be doubted. But this does not mean to say that all his works are worth performing. On the contrary, his great facility in writing often impairs the quality of his musical production. Even he, though his music is based on the best traditions, is always in risk of falling into a contrapuntal routine, which leads to monotony. His versatility is prodigious. He has gathered a group of followers and pupils, who have now become his fellow-composers. He hates solemnity. What he aims at is music for every-day use. Of course he endeavours, on the other hand, to give the world important works. For the reason already mentioned, however, his artistic labour often gives better proof of his craftsmanship than of his imaginative power. This was particularly the case with the Concerto for viola d'amour and chamber orchestra. The work is one of a series of concertos for solo instruments that were commissioned by the publishing house of Schott.

Hindemith played it himself. Apart from the poor sonority to be drawn from an instrument that has for good reasons completely gone out of fashion, it was only some witty passages in the orchestra that represented the composer's personality. His strong vitality, so impressive in his Concerto for viola and orchestra, was apparently hampered by the particular conditions which he had imposed on himself.

The performance occurred at one of the chamber-music concerts given by Michael Taube, who has worked well for present-day chamber music at Berlin.

ETHEL SMYTH AS CONDUCTOR

Ethel Smyth, the leading figure among women composers of our time, gave a concert of her own compositions with the Berlin Philharmonic. It would be superfluous to inform the readers of the Musical Times that the spirit represented by this excellent musician is far from that of modern music as understood by the youth of all European countries. Notwithstanding, her concert aroused considerable interest in musical circles. First of all, a lady of mature age conducting with indefatigable energy could not but attract general attention; in the second place a thorough craftsmanship such as hers could hardly help win praise. She had called Bruno Walter to her assistance, and his popularity helped her to fill the concert hall. Walter conducted some fragments from the opera 'Strandrecht' ('The Wreckers'), and these were the best part of the programme. There is in them a dramatic force uncommon even in works of male fellow-composers. A Concerto for violin and horn, very adequately performed by two English artists, and some impressive choral works that did much credit both to the composer and to the leader of some hundred musicians, completed the favourable impression of an interesting personality.

SCHÖNBERG'S VARIATIONS FOR ORCHESTRA

I have rarely witnessed a scandal such as, at the Berlin Philharmonic, followed the performance of Schönberg's 'Variations for Orchestra,' under the baton of Wilhelm Furtwängler. In these days the revolutionary composer may, after so many experiences in his native town of Vienna, consider such protestations against his work as the best proof of their value. But I doubt whether he is right in this case. There are, of course, even among Berlin concert-goers, many persons who so obstinately cling to tradition that every sound contradicting what they are accustomed to hear offends and annoys them. This time, however, even those who are inclined towards modernity though not joining in the protestations, could not but refuse the problematic gift they were offered. Schönberg's 'Variations' are a unique example of mastery, but of mastery devoted to something that does not deserve its attention. We find in this work a very curious collection of solved problems. Yet with all its astonishing artistry this is very far from what we call music; the 'Variations' belong rather to mathematics or chemistry. Some traces of 'Tristan' are to be found in what has to be regarded as their subject. This relationship, however, makes them appear as a mere caricature. It is, as it were, old-fashioned modernity wrought to the highest stage of evolution. Furtwängler had dedicated all his care to the work. We may rightly suppose that he was true to the style and to the details of the music, and that the systematic cacophony was what the composer intended us to hear.

HOLLAND

The many Schubert celebrations have brought forward nothing worthy of special note and, fortunately, have not swamped everything else, as it seemed likely at one time that they would. Two features of the musical life of Holland at the present moment are the development of interest in the work of native composers at the one hand and in that of British composers and interpreters on the other. It is not surprising that one of the chief promoters of interest in both of these is Evert Cornelis, the gifted conductor of the Utrecht Municipal Orchestra, for he is a musician of wide sympathies and tastes, and makes it his life-work to introduce everything possible of the best from wherever it may come. As conductor also of the Rotterdam and District 'Toonkunst' Choir, he recently gave the first performance of 'The Messiah' in its original form, which was also the second (the first took place last year at Utrecht also under his direction) with the English words. His introductory note to the programme gave his reasons for doing this with exemplary brevity. 'In the first place,' he said, 'the original text will now be used, by which means the inner relation which exists between music and words will be honoured. That in this case it concerns English words provides an unsought opportunity to drive into its proper obscurity the legend of the unsingable character of this language (an observation that is parroted from one to another without reason). The music of Handel, moreover, is so specifically English, and 'The Messiah' as an oratorio so specifically an English invention, that we are only at long last doing Handel bare justice.'

These are striking words for a musician brought up in the conservative German traditions of Holland, but his actions were even better than his words. Never (it is a strong term, but I use it advisedly) during a long experience of the best English performances of this work have I heard a better enunciation of the words or a more intimate realisation of the relation between the words and music than was achieved by this choir of a hundred and fifty Rotterdam amateurs. Their pronunciation of some of the difficult English consonants, more than that of the vowels, occasionally, but only occasionally, left something to be desired, but this was a faint spot on the sun of the general interpretation. Dorothy Silk, Margaret Balfour, Frank Titterton, and Arthur Cranmer were the soloists, and their singing was a revelation to many of the audience who were not familiar with the work, of how great a vocal writer Handel was. They, along with Mr. Cornelis, received a great share of the enthusiastic applause, and to the Dutchmen as well as to the few English present it was a great occasion.

The same soloists gave a concert the following evening for the local 'Kunstkring,' the programme of which was made up of ancient and modern British songs with several quartets. It was the latter which made the greater impression, though the songs afforded considerable pleasure. One critic voiced the general feeling in saying that more of such quartets would have been welcome, as they were both beautiful and typically English. Similar propaganda was continued by these same singers in the form of broadcasting from Hilversum, and by Miss Brunskill of a couple of recitals, one at Amsterdam and one at The Hague. Miss Brunskill's programmes were made up of songs by contemporary composers, all of whom are already known here. Her recitals were given under the auspices of the Netherland-England Society, so that she was assured of audiences at least to some extent sympathetic to her aims. In spite of the critics' penchant for the discovery of reminiscences and influences, the singing of British songs by such excellent singers is having a great effect here, and this five days of concentrated work cannot but be of considerable importance to the cause of British music on the Continent. Nor must one omit to mention the recital of Dorothy Helmrich, in which this young and gifted artist discreetly introduced among standard works songs by Purcell, Morley, Byrd, Delius, Martin Shaw, and Peter Warlock. She had a great and well-merited success.

Of works by native musicians those by Willem Pijper naturally take the first place. It is curious to know that until a few weeks ago many of his most important works had never been heard at Utrecht, the city in which he received his education and in a suburban village of which he was born. Again it was Cornelis who was the moving spirit, and his orchestra backed him up splendidly in the 'Epigrams,' written for the Concertgebouw Jubilee last season, and in the Pianoforte Concerto, in which the composer was the soloist. Both these works are striking in their conciseness and clarity, and were not in any degree spoilt by close association with the Haydn Concerto in D which Pijper had arranged for modern orchestra, doing this with the utmost discretion and good taste. The Residentie Orchestra, under Pieter van Anrooy, has given several repetitions of the 'Summer Piece' of Alex Wormolen and the 'Intermezzo Pastorale' of Johan Wagenaar, both works continuing to give great pleasure in spite of their undue length, and he has produced, under the direction of the composer and with Jean Devert as soloist, a very pleasing Suite for viola and orchestra by Leo Ruygrok.

One has not space to mention all the many 'celebrities' who have played and sung with brilliance and acceptability works with which we are familiar. A visit worthy of note, however, was that of Joseph Jongen to Amsterdam, where, with the Concertgebouw Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, he played his new Symphonie Concertante for organ and orchestra. The work is typical of its composer; too long for its material, with reminiscences too strong to pass unobserved, and yet with moments of rare beauty and with a general effectiveness and often striking originality, particularly in the instrumentation and organ registering. If he could see his way to re-write the work in a terser form it would be a fine addition to the limited repertory for this combination.

Two other welcome works in recent Concertgebouw programmes have been the Mottl arrangement of the ballet Suite from Gretry's 'Cephale et Procris' and Schumann's 'Rhenish' Symphony, a work which, curiously, bears more traces of Handel influence than of that of Bach. 'Le Théâtre Ambulant de la Petite Scène' has visited several towns here with a programme consisting of 'La Guitare,' an amusing and very effectively written one-Act Opéra-comique by Carlos Pedrell, a nephew of the great leader of the Spanish school; 'Roses in Metal,' a wearisome and nonsensical ballet notwithstanding its moral lesson, by Arthur Honegger; and Gluck's 'L'Ivrogne corrigé,' or 'Le Mariage du Diable,' a delightful work. One wonders why it is not produced daily by both professional and amateur troups. The Hague 'Studie kring voor Moderne Muziek' has added to its members' indebtedness by producing Malipiero's Sonate à Tre and Ernest Bloch's 'Five Sepia Sketches' and 'Baal Schem.'

There have been two events of outstanding interest in the latter part of December, the one a two-days' Honegger Festival at Utrecht, and the other a wide-spread propaganda of Spanish music, of which the chief item was a concert directed by Fernandez Arbos, held in conjunction with an exhibition of Spanish painting and sculpture. The interest in Arthur Honegger and his work was also not confined to the one town, but included a chamber-music concert in the New Music Lyceum at Amsterdam. The first evening at Utrecht was devoted to orchestral works, which the composer conducted. The works were none of them new, and what aroused the greatest interest and admiration was the remarkable control of varied rhythms which Honegger possesses. 'Judith' and 'Antigone,' conducted by Evert Cornelis and sung by the local 'Toonkunst' Choral Society, formed the second evening's programme. The massive chorus work of the former and the dramatic significance of the latter added considerably to the composer's popularity. One of the leading critics here described the performance of these two works as 'a deed of true significance.' In the Spanish concert at The Hague de Falla, Turina, Albeniz, and Halffter were all drawn upon, the last for a Sinfonietta which was more typically national than the other works. José Iturbi, as the most eminent Spanish artist available, appeared as solo pianist, but spoilt the national character of the concert by playing Liszt's E flat Concerto.

One of the most successful of the many musical evenings recently arranged by the Netherland-England Society was that given by the British Folk-Singers. This party gave, besides a number of folk-songs in various forms and a series of solos on the Northumbrian bagpipes, a group of Christmas carols, the refrains of which Mr. Frank Howes, the conductor-accompanist-speaker, persuaded the stolid Dutchmen into singing with considerable gusto. It was with evident regret that the unusually large audience received the intimation that it was time to go home.

Among native works a new Concertino for pianoforte by Henrietta Bosmans has been produced by the Concertgebouw Orchestra under Monteux, with the composer as soloist. Not so original as some of her other works, it is yet interesting and well-written. Monteux has also revived the second Symphony of Cornelis Dopper, in which the composer attempted to present some of the same Dutch characteristics as Rembrandt did in his pictures. Most of the local critics acclaimed it as a work that was thoroughly national, but personally, while I enjoyed it as a well-constructed, melodic, and richly-scored work, I could find little that distinguished it as national Dutch and much that recalled the idols of our (Mr. Dopper's and my own) youth—Mendelssohn, Brahms, and something of Berlioz and Beethoven. I hear that a Bach Society, the chief object of which is the performance of the Cantatas, has been started at Amsterdam under the direction of Frans Hasselaar.

HERBERT ANTCLIFFE

ITALY

MILAN

The second of the novelties at La Scala this year, Giordano's 'Il Re,' was produced on January 12, and more than satisfied the general expectation. In this work the melodious Giordano has proved beyond doubt that modernity can run with the classic lines of pure bel canto, with, one is happy to add, decided advantage to the former.

The story is set by Forzano 'in a country where there was a King' in 1700. As the caption implies, the play is allegorical, and on the lines of a fable. One cannot say, that from a literary point of view the libretto touches the divine heights. That is not expected in Forzano. He is too good a writer for the people and the theatre for that. Sound in construction, and naturally, as he is the best producer in Italy, perfectly adapted to the exigencies of the stage, 'Il Re' lies in the category of popular plays well enough written not to offend the tastes of the æsthetic. It deals with a romantically-minded village girl who falls in love with the king, only to discover in camera that within his high-boots he wears stilts to increase his stature, and that his hair is all wig. She returns and marries her village swain.

It had been doubted whether the composer of the weighty dramatic music of 'Andrea Chenier' could clothe so light a subject in suitable musical raiment. While it is not possible to say that the opera was a triumphal success—the libretto alone forbids that—a definite and certain success must be credited to the composer. Giordano had been silent for a few years, and people were saying that the fount had dried up. In 'Il Re' quite the reverse has been the result. The score is abounding with gems of lustrous beauty. The spring of melody that has always been Giordano's still runs clear and sparkling, as frankly and spontaneously as thirty-five years ago. But his form has improved, and his knowledge of orchestration developed to a remarkable degree. It is a sad fact that to-day the age of vocal virtuosismo is passed, and the simple fact that the score of 'Il Re' contains some of the most exquisite singers' passages led some of the critics into the folly of finding an excess of melody. To his melodies, pure and classic, appealing and likeable, Giordano has lent a touch of modernity that renders them far more beautiful than anything that has been heard here for many years. The parts are so well united and balanced that the continuity is never broken. The Sextet of the first scene is very jolly and droll, as also is the Terzetto in the second section. In the first there is a duet that goes splendidly, and an aria that gives every chance to the tenor for artistic singing. There are two intermezzos that show the composer's sense of tone-colour and vivid lights. His instrumentation throughout is discreet and tasteful, and one may say with conviction that the opera as a whole, light and fanciful, graceful and sensitive, should find favour with almost any audience. The humour and style of the work are, indeed, far more likely to please Anglo-Saxon tastes than Latin. Toscanini conducted the opera as usual from memory, and, as is also usual, with unexceptionable musicianship.

First among the artists came the delightful Toti dal Monte, whose exquisite coloratura voice was in fact the inspiration of the work. Her acting was graceful and effective, and, even though she is a leggero, touching. The King himself was portrayed by the baritone Armando Crabbé. He has a fine voice and artistic instinct, and the rôle was helped by his shortness of stature. Enzo de Muro Lomanto sang the village swain's lines, and if he lacked dramatic delivery, he certainly had plenty of finesse. His solo in the second scene was charming. His excellent mezza-voce left nothing to be desired, and his diction was clear. Tancredi Pasero, the girl's father, showed a splendid manly bass of the bel canto school, and a sense of interpretation. His wife—in the play—was sung by Angelica Cravcenko, and in these robes she acquitted herself well. The caste in complex is probably one of the finest that La Scala has given us this year.

LUCIEN BERNHEIM

Nineteen songs by this Swiss composer were sung at a recital by his wife, Rose Bernheim. They revealed a highly sensitive musicianship, imagination, and the ability to write an attractive voice-part.

PARIS

The Opéra-Comique recently produced a new musical comedy, ' Riquet à la Houppe,' to music by M. G. Huë. The libretto, by M. R. Gastambide, is based upon Perrault. Huë, a composer of well-established merit, has given us many beautiful pages of music in his songs, in his ballet ' Siang-Sin,' and in his operatic drama ' A l'Ombre de la Cathédrale,' which also figures in the répertoire of the Opéra-Comique. In ' Riquet à la Houppe ' he complies as far as he can with the unreal and fantastic atmosphere of the piece. While the burlesque and the fairy elements of the music bear the mark of conscientious effort, the composer holds his own more easily in the lyrical pages, which are better in tune with his musical personality. They are of excellent quality and sufficient to ensure a lasting success to the work.

Passing to recent concerts, so much has been happening that we are obliged to limit these notes to the more outstanding events. Among them we must note the performance by the Pasdeloup Orchestra, under the direction of M. Inghelbrecht, of important fragments of Chabrier's ' Le Roi malgré lui.' This work was first presented in 1887 by the Opéra-Comique, and had a prospect of permanent success, but the fire that destroyed that theatre put an end to a career hardly begun. The work has since been performed in Germany, but the French public were given no further chance to acquaint themselves with it. The move of the Pasdeloup Orchestra revived keen interest in Chabrier's music, and it is to be hoped that the directors of the Opéra-Comique will some day take up and present in due form this precious item of modern French music.

The Orchestre Symphonique de Paris is displaying great activity in order to realise the vast programme of eighty concerts announced at the moment of its creation. Thus a special concert was consecrated to Glazounov, who conducted. The programme comprised, with other items, ' Stenka Razine,' the seventh Symphony, and the second Concerto for pianoforte, which was remarkably well played by Madame Gavrilow. The Russian master had a hearty welcome both on his own merits and as a representative, for the Western public, of the Rimsky-Korsakov tradition. Two other regular concerts were put in charge of M. Otto Klemperer, director of the ' Kroll-Oper ' of Berlin. Among the classical works figuring on his programme were the D minor Suite by Bach and Beethoven's seventh Symphony, both given in powerful and sober style. The German conductor acquainted us also with Paul Hindemith's ' Konzertmusik ' for wind instruments and with a Suite arranged from Krenek's ' Jonny spielt auf.' In a subsequent concert M. Ansermet conducted another Hindemith item, namely, a Concerto for large orchestra. In both works the German composer gives typical examples of his ever-marching rhythmic and contrapuntal style, wherein little place is left for self-search and lyrical expression. There is, however, frank joy, untrammelled good-humour, and a generous flourish of counterpoint flooding upon the auditor in breathless sequence.

With the ever-increasing number of concert associations on the one hand and the shortage of lyrical theatres on the other, we are witnessing a steady transfer of opera and ballet to the concert-platform. For instance, we have had, in addition to Chabrier's ' Roi malgré lui,' concert performances of de Falla's ' Retablo del Maese Pedro ' and Milhaud's negro ballet, ' La Création du Monde.' The former was produced last season by the Opéra-Comique, along with ' La Vida breve ' and ' El Amor brujo,' and Milhaud's ballet had been created some years ago by the Swedish Ballets Company of M. Rolf de Maré. Both works undoubtedly gained by the change. Their purely musical qualities, often obscured under more or less clumsy stage-makeshifts, have come to the front much to the astonishment of the public, and, perhaps, of the composers themselves. M. Ansermet and the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris performed the two scores to perfection, proving once more how difficult it is for pure music, when coupled with stage action, to step over the footlights and win the great public.

Whether revised or not since its first performance by the Swedish Ballets, ' La Création du Monde ' is the best thing we have heard by M. Milhaud. As to de Falla's puppet-piece, ' Retablo del Maese Pedro,' the performance by the O.S.P. enabled us to appreciate the elegance of style, the frankness and the purity of the melodic lines, the richness of harmony and of orchestra.

TORONTO

As far as music is concerned the month of December is shortened here at Toronto to just over two weeks, to allow full freedom for the various Christmas activities, with the result that there is quite a congestion of concerts before the holidays.

There have been two notable events since my last letter—a farewell concert by the great Flonzaley String Quartet and the Canadian debut of the distinguished German dramatic soprano, Gertrude Kappel. The Flonzaleys have never played with more finished brilliance, nor could they have chosen works in more delightful contrast than the Beethoven C major, the Schubert G major, and two movements from Erwin Schuloff's first Quartet. Gertrude Kappel, we found, sings her Wagner with fine authority. She has unusual range and dramatic ability, and is particularly fond of Schubert, Brahms, and Franz.

Three famous tenors were well favoured—our own member of the Metropolitan Opera ranks, Edward Johnson; Tito Schipa, leading artist of the Chicago Opera; and Joseph Lautner, a sound American of real ability.

For the popular taste come Paul Whiteman, the ' king of dance music,' presenting the latest additions to ' classical jazz '—George Gershwin's Concerto in F, for pianoforte and orchestra; ' Metropolis,' a clever picturesque by Forde Grofe, and two hilarious comedy numbers—' Free Air ' and ' Variations on Noises from a Garage.'

Locally, the Toronto Symphony Orchestra gave us Brahms's third Symphony, the ' Rakoczy ' March, and the Saint-Saëns Concerto No. 2, with the clever Montreal pianist, Ellen Bullon, at the pianoforte. And with the Hart House String Quartet, whose work is becoming more and more subtle in artistry, we found many glorious moments in the Schubert C major Quintet for strings, the Brahms C minor Quartet, Op. 51, No. 1, and Wolf's Serenade.

Mr. Geze de Kresz, the leader of the Hart House ensemble and one of the finest artists who has ever made this city his home—gave an inspiring programme in the Hart House Theatre, playing the Tchaikovsky Concerto, Ravel's ' Tzigane,' and some delightful sketches by Korngold. Two other successful recitals were those by Jeanne Dusseau, soprano, and Donald Heins, violin, the latter having at the pianoforte Thomas J. Crawford.

WIND BANDS AND MUSIC

On November 6 Major Hoby, late of the Royal Marines Band, read a paper before the Musical Association on 'Wind Bands and Music.' The bibliography of the subject was, he said, but a scanty one. The most complete English work was a fairly short treatise by Mr. Farmer called 'The Rise of Military Music.' Real wind-band music was not a very old-established concern, but was an older one than orchestral music. It could be classified into seven clearly defined periods.

Period one began in the 15th century, when there existed flute bands in most European countries. The second period, late in the 15th century, gave us the Zink bands. The Zink was made in various sizes and pitches, the serpent being the bass form. Zink bands were usually non-military. In this country, instead of Zink bands, we found a curious mixture of instruments. From about 1550, there was a development of mechanism and a production of better combinations. The town bands concentrated on the double-reed instruments. The invention of the clarinet in 1690 ushered in the fourth period, which showed a great step forward. The wind bands were first in the field, and the clarinet did not come into the orchestra for another fifty years. From now wind bands became almost the exclusive property of soldiers and sailors. About 1720 was the date when the fourth period could be definitely traced. Germany and Austria took the lead, but this country was not far behind.

The fifth period was an era of further activity, especially in France. The band of the National Guard was raised, and existing bands were strengthened. In 1795 a School of regimental music was founded under Sarrette, which afterwards became the Paris Conservatoire. This period was undoubtedly the time in which military bands began to come into their own as serious combinations. Open-air music was lifted into a superior position. Within this period fell the invention of the key-bugle by Halliday in 1810. At the start of the sixth period, about 1830, we had the chromatic key-bugle and bass-horn; the trombone was chromatic, but the trumpet and horn had only harmonic sounds. The wood-wind was, of course, by now chromatic. In 1845 France took the lead. There was a commission to re-organize French Service Bands; but the 1848 Revolution stopped everything. In 1854 a scheme was drawn up, largely on representations made by Berlioz, and in it we found the newly-invented saxophones which the French Army was the first to use. The characteristic tone of French bands ever since was largely due to these instruments. In this country, through the late Duke of Cambridge, steps were taken in 1856 for the better training of military musicians, and, as a result, there came the establishment of the Royal Military School of Music at Kneller Hall, where first-rate work was done. The Royal Naval School of Music at Eastney was founded as recently as 1903.

After alluding to the contributions of composers, classical and contemporary, and to the literature of wind music, Major Hoby went on to the question of pitch, which was a bothering one, as Service bands were cut off from the real musical pitch of to-day. Abroad it had been settled, and in this country something would have to be done about it. The golden opportunity was lost just after the war, when most bands of line regiments had to be refitted with instruments. The Army Council took the advice of certain misleading experts, and allowed the high pitch to stand in the imagined interest of brilliancy. The advice showed a very imperfect knowledge of musical requirements. Anyone who had heard the best of Continental bands knew that low pitch did not mean dull tone. A great drawback was that British bands could never combine with foreign musicians in ceremonials. This was particularly hard on naval bands which went ashore to such functions, and which had to stand out.

Kneller Hall now used the low pitch for what was called the 'engagement band,' and the bands of the Royal Artillery and the Royal Engineers had lately adopted Continental pitch in their orchestral combinations. It was to be hoped that the Royal Marines would soon do likewise, though the expense might now be considerable. Then low pitch for the wind band combinations would have to follow. The musicians of the Guards Bands in London had to provide themselves with low-pitch instruments at their own expense for use in private engagements.

There was a problem to be solved which had never yet been seriously tackled, and again it had been shelved. It would hardly be believed by most musicians that there was no international standard of scoring and publishing for wind bands. We in this country were shut off from French and German scoring; the very notations differed from ours and from each other. A foreign publisher could not sell his band music to us, or if he did, it had to be largely rearranged and rewritten. It seemed unthinkable that while orchestral published music was in a universal language, there should at this time of day be at least four languages in wind-band music. Now was the time for a congress of publishers and band directors to put things right. It would be a very difficult business, but it could be accomplished.

The seventh period was the present day. The aftermath of the war had very much altered things on the Continent. The disappearance of the German Army had meant the extinction of a number of very fine bands, and chaos in the way of production of wind-band music. The Reichswehr had a few bands much reduced in numbers, which comprised as a rule from twenty-two to twenty-five players. Austria had almost disappeared from the scene. There were only some twenty to thirty left in her small army. In France one of the finest bands of the Service, the Engineers, of Versailles, an historic band, had just been abolished. There still existed the famous Garde of Paris and a considerable number of army bands, all reduced in size, scattered through the country. Italy and Spain possessed a number of fine bands, especially Spain. Other countries had never gone in wholeheartedly for Service music; still many of them had some excellent bands.

In this country our most famous old-time bands still existed, and during and since the war two more had been added, the Welsh Guards and the Royal Air Force. But a number of cavalry and infantry bands had ceased to exist owing to the Army reductions. We had a number of non-Service bands of the military band type. It was a pity there was no term in our language to describe them other than as civilian military bands, a cumbersome and contradictory appellation. We stood to-day with the best possible means to an artistic end. There were no better instruments in the world than we possessed, we had the men with the technique, and on the whole we had the encouragement of the leading Service authorities. The public taste, however, was showing signs of losing interest and turning to bad negroid stuff. Nevertheless, when the B.B.C. ran its plebiscite for the opinions of listeners-in, the majority voted for military band music as the kind of entertainment they most wanted.

The kind of music wind-band people desired at the moment was works of the style of Liszt's symphonic poems, or of Smetana's tone-poems, pieces such as German's 'Welsh Rhapsody' and 'Tempter' Suite, and good concert overtures in suitable idiom. All these forms could be treated in the light of modern, but not ultra-modern, means of expression.

The application of the valve and other great improvements in the mechanism and tone-production of brass instruments had the effect of bringing into being a combination that for many reasons appealed to workingmen amateurs in every European country that cared for instrumental music of worth. Even in the last ten years technique and expression had reached a high pitch of excellence, so that what was once considered difficult was to-day regarded as comparatively easy. Despite their restrictions, there was a place in music for these brass bands. They had their own distinct idiom, choral style came out admirably, a great deal of organ music could be brought to the masses through arrangements, but better still, composers of worth could do a great deal for them.

Every town should have a good town band, not a brass band, but a full wind or military band. The working man who to-day put down his hard-earned shillings in support of his band, who was paying for his instrument out of his spare cash, who shouldered the responsibility of keeping a band alive, was doing his best, but a town band ought to be something more than a working-man's brass band struggling along and almost unrecognised. Its cost would not be great, deducting the receipts from the expenses. There was a deal of wind-band talent in this country that only wanted proper direction. This did not imply that town bands should give their whole time. That was impossible as things were now. What was suggested was the organization of the talent we had which was to be found in offices, workshops, and many other places. The Territorial Band was a good example of such organization. The keen amateur wind players who gave up so much of their spare time were a splendid nucleus. With a very few professional leaders in some parts or even without these, under a director who knew his job, great work could be done. A band of at least forty performers ought to be aimed at. What was wanted was the interest of professional musicians, and the help of the more well-to-do.

At the conclusion of the paper, Prof. E. J. Dent, the newly-elected President of the Association, Mr. D. J. Blaikley, and Capt. Manuel Bilton spoke on various aspects of the subject.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

Adolph Brodsky, at Manchester, on January 22. He was born at Taganrog, in Russia, on March 21, 1851, and showed unusual musical ability at a very early age. When nine years old he was sent to Vienna Conservatorium to study the violin under Hellmesberger. After three years' tuition he joined Hellmesberger's Quartet as second violin; he played in the Opera orchestra from 1868 to 1870. Three years later he began a further period of study under Ferdinand Laub, at Moscow, and on the death of his teacher, in 1875, he was appointed to the staff of the local Conservatorium. In 1879 he removed to Kieff, where he conducted the symphony orchestra for two years. A successful concert tour followed (London, Paris, Vienna, &c.), at the end of which he succeeded Schradieck as professor at Leipsic Conservatorium. At Leipsic he played frequently at the Gewandhaus concerts, and formed a Quartet that was to become famous—Brodsky, Hans Becker, Hans Sitt, and Julius Klengel. In 1890 he went to America as leader of the Damrosch Symphony Society in New York; five years later he accepted an invitation from Hallé to fill a similar position at Manchester, thus beginning an association with the city that remained unbroken. On Hallé's death Brodsky acted as his successor for a while. In 1895 he was made Principal of the Royal Manchester College of Music. He received the honorary degree of Mus. Doc. from Victoria University in 1902.

We quote the following from an article by Mr. Neville Cardus in the Manchester Guardian, by kind permission:

'Dr. Brodsky was a democrat in his view of music, and would speak of his playing to audiences at the Ancoats Brotherhood in pre-war days with as much relish as he would speak of his glamorous concerts in Vienna with Richter. The man in the street knew and loved Brodsky mainly because of the Brodsky Quartet. In Manchester the Quartet—with Mr. Carl Fuchs, Mr. Simon Speelmann, and Mr. Rawdon Briggs, the Doctor's colleagues—laid down a tradition of chamber music second to none in this country. As time passed changes inevitably had to be made in the Quartet, but Brodsky played on—interrupted only by the war—and as recently as December 11 he led the Quartet at a Tuesday Mid-day Concert. Dr. Brodsky's last appearance as a solo violinist at a Hallé Concert was on January 20, 1927. He then played the Elgar Violin Concerto, with Elgar himself conducting. A precious memory is the mazeful notes of Dr. Brodsky's interpretation of the romantic cadenza; the style was purity itself. He was then in his seventy-sixth year. Dr. Brodsky's devoted treatment of the Elgar Concerto in this country and in Vienna must be counted a contribution of no impermanent order to music. For great interpretations are to be regarded as the links which make the immortal chain of the classics.

'Dr. Brodsky was, in the happiest sense, a musician's violinist. He never let his fine technique come between us and the music he was playing. He had not the narrow style of the virtuoso; style for Brodsky was character-truth to the master composers. . . . . He used to say: "There is no classical or modern music: there is only good and bad music." How wide were his sympathies and how flexible his art will be understood when it is realised that he was the first man to reveal the beauties of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto while, at the same time, he was making the Brahms Concerto almost as much his own as it was Joachim's.

'He never fell into the tracks of professionalism. If he played a work for the hundredth time he would make it fresh by the new delight he himself found in it. Manchester will remember always the way Dr. Brodsky would lead his Quartet, how he would lie back and give himself up to a noble phrase; how, in a slow movement, you could see his very soul turning upon itself, retiring to the music's peaceful sanctuary. Then, with the advent of a quick movement, how he would relax genially, as though saying to us, "That was a very solemn music; now let 's have a merry bit!"

'In his old age his playing had the simplest eloquence; we could see that the wheel of his life had come full circle beautifully. He was now free to surrender nearly all the sensuous elements of violin-playing, requiring no more tone than was wanted to fill out a phrase. A year or two ago I heard him in one of the quartets of Beethoven's last period. As I listened to Dr. Brodsky's tenuous figuration in the slow movement I felt that here at last was faithful expression of the sublime purification of style which was Beethoven's own secret at the end of his life—a style which asked for none but a primary tone, the simplest essential material of music, a music which we do not so much hear as overhear.

'At the Royal Manchester College of Music he was guide, philosopher, and friend. Amongst his more famous pupils are Anton Maaskoff, Lena Kontorovitch, Arthur Catterall, Alfred Barker. But his splendid influence went to work in countless unobtrusive ways. To the last he attended the Hallé Concerts, and you could get the sense of his presence any Thursday evening in the string-playing of the Hallé Orchestra. He was the kindest of friends, mingling humour and irony in mellow proportion. He was one of the few musicians of the present writer's experience who understood that a critic is in his own way trying to work as an artist from a point of view not necessarily that of the local performer. But Brodsky was far more than a musician; he was a rare spirit, made wise through long devotion to life and to art.'

Harriet Elizabeth Trask, at Clifton, Bristol, on November 22, aged seventy-two. A skilled musician—she received much of her training at Dresden—she acted as voluntary organist and choirmaster for over fifty years at Norton Parish Church, Somerset. She showed marked ability as a choral conductor, and for many years directed a choir recruited from about eight towns and villages, training each contingent separately, and bringing them together for final rehearsal and performance. With this body of singers she gave excellent performances of important works by Bach, Gluck, Wagner ('Parsifal' selection), Elgar ('King Olaf'), and Gounod, as well as the more familiar examples of Handel and Mendelssohn. At its largest this remarkable choir was a hundred and forty strong. First-rate soloists were invariably engaged, and rarely indeed can such performances have been heard in small local centres as those given by Miss Trask's singers. A believer in the competition festival movement, she founded the South Somerset Musical Competition, serving as hon. secretary for the first thirteen years of its existence. A reference to her work occurs in Louis N. Parker's recently-published autobiography, from which we quote (Mr. Parker was at one time Director of Music at Sherborne School):

> 'I claim to have found at least one good, all-round musician in the person of Miss Ettie Trask; for though she studied in Dresden I think she would confess it was at Sherborne she really had the possibilities of music disclosed to her. Now she is a living force in her own neighbourhood. She has trained a body of singers to a point of high efficiency, which enables them gaily to tackle Bach, Gluck, and indeed all the stiffest works. She spares no pains. She rides round from village to village, rehearsing fragments and even individual members of her choir. She has a magnetic personality, which inspires everyone with whom she comes into contact. She has brought joy into hundreds of grey lives. Other reward she does not seek. There is none. She does her work unostentatiously, without advertisement, without any fanfare of trumpets; many women who have done far less for music are Dames.'

George Frederick Vincent, at Brentwood, aged seventy-four. He was a native of Sunderland, and after a school period at Durham he went to Leipsic to complete his musical studies. On his return he opened music-training schools at Newcastle and Sunderland, and for twenty-five years was organist at St. Thomas's, Sunderland. In 1882 he founded the Sunderland Amateur Operatic Society. He left Sunderland to take up the organist's post at St. Michael's, Cornhill, where he remained for about sixteen years, and originated the mid-day recitals that have since been a popular feature. As an examiner for Trinity College he had travelled widely throughout the Empire.

Harriett Claiborne Dixon, at Folkestone, suddenly, on November 9, 1928. She received her early training at the Royal Academy of Music, being later (1898) elected an Associate. In 1896 she became A.R.C.M. She was also an A.R.C.O. and a Mus. Bac. (Durham). For a time she conducted the Bradford Old Choral Society and the Bradford Festival Choral Society, several of her compositions being performed by the latter body. Several of her works were produced in America, including the incidental music to a Greek play. She was a successful and enthusiastic teacher.

Harry E. Cookson, at Bradford, on January 7, aged sixty-five. Since 1895 he had been principal bass in the choir of Bradford Cathedral. Prior to this appointment, he had spent five years as choirmaster of Christ Church, Bradford, besides doing service as soloist in various church choirs from boyhood. For nearly forty years he was librarian of the Bradford Musical Union, and a prominent member of the Bradford Festival Choral Society.

Walter O. Goldschmidt, at Upper Norwood, on January 18, aged seventy-five. The elder son of Jenny Lind (Mrs. Otto Goldschmidt), he was educated in England, became a professional pianist, and was for a time associated with Sarasate. As an accompanist he was well known on the Continent.

Vincent Dearden, at Leicester, on December 15. An A.R.C.M. and F.R.C.O., he was organist and choirmaster at St. John the Baptist, Clarendon Park, Leicester, and conductor of the Leicester Glee and Madrigal Society, in which capacities he did much valuable work.

Edward Robinson, at Chester, on January 1. A Yorkshireman by birth, he became a lay-clerk at Chester Cathedral about forty-seven years ago. He was also an excellent choir-trainer, having won many successes at Eistedfoddau. For many years he was conductor of the Chester Glee Club.

Lucien Capet, on December 18, aged fifty-five. He was trained chiefly at the Paris Conservatoire, where he succeeded his teacher, J. P. Maurin, as violin professor. As founder and leader of the Capet String Quartet he did distinguished work for chamber music.

Elizabeth Mary Fletcher (née Misquith), at Bangalore, aged seventy-five. For many years she was organist at the Scottish kirk at Bangalore, and was a well-known teacher of music.

In reference to the late Oscar Sonneck, whose obituary appeared last month, Mr. Hubert J. Foss kindly sends us the following personal note:

Oscar T. G. Sonneck was an American born of Teutonic stock, and was educated in Germany—a fact of some significance in his life and in his influence in musical America. He was, perhaps, best known in England for the magazine he founded and edited, the Musical Quarterly, in whose pages appeared so many learned and permanent contributions from English and European as well as American writers. But this was a mere side-line of an active musical mind. The most important task of his life was probably accomplished during the fifteen years he spent as librarian of the Music Section of the Library of Congress at Washington, where he built up a magnificent collection worthy of the international fame it gained. Among other things he gathered for this library what he claimed to be the most complete collection of opera librettos in the world. Certainly he left for his friend and successor, Carl Engel, a fine foundation for further work. Oscar Sonneck joined the music publishing house of G. Schirmer as a musical director, and here his wide musical sympathies combined with his careful and scholarly mind found excellent scope. He was all his life interested in the young American composer, and both as publisher and inspirer did fine service to native American music. His philosophical studies he pursued as a hobby, producing three notable books on Beethoven during the recent Centenary year—'Impressions of Contemporaries,' 'The Riddle of the Immortal Beloved,' and 'Beethoven Letters in America,' the last-named attempting to exhaust all American sources, but failing, since the author himself found several further letters after the book was published. The Beethoven Association of America, with its lovely house, its concerts, its Beethoveniana, and its homely and dignified traditions, is a product of Sonneck's mind and activity that will keep his memory green for all who visit it—perhaps the quietest place in New York City! Always thorough but imaginative, interested in the old as a scholar and the new as a man, with business as well as bibliographical gifts, Oscar Sonneck was a very distinctive personality whom New York will miss more than it perhaps yet realises.

Miscellaneous

The Queensborough Operatic and Dramatic Society has recently been formed in West London. The Society's honorary producer is Mr. Julius Walther, and the honorary musical director is Mr. Ettore Mazzoleni. There are a few vacancies in the ranks. Full particulars from the Hon. Secretary, Miss Valerie Desmond, 57, Queensborough Terrace, W.2.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze will give lecture-demonstrations at the New Scala Theatre on February 2 (2.30 p.m.) and 4 (8.30 p.m.). Illustrations will be provided by a class of children, and by students from the Training Department of the London School of Dalcroze Eurhythmics. Tickets and particulars at the School (23, Store Street, W.C.1), and the Scala Theatre box office.

The financial statement to be presented at the next general meeting of the stewards of the Three Choirs Festival shows that the recent Gloucester meeting resulted in a disposable balance of £3,018—about £700 less than that of the previous Gloucester Festival. The receipts were £8,986 (sale of tickets, £5,406); the expenditure was £5,968.

Under the auspices of the Training School for Music Teachers, Mr. Stanley Stubbs will conduct a weekly class in Sight-Singing and Aural Training at the School (73, High Street, Marylebone). Membership is open to all, and may commence at any time. The class will be held on Thursdays, at 7.30 p.m.

The London Sunday School Choir, a thousand strong, gives a concert at the Royal Albert Hall on February 16, at 6.30 p.m. The soloists will be Miss Dorothy Hinton, Miss Muriel Brunskill, and Mr. Robert Easton, and Mr. Sidney Brown (organ). Mr. Frank E. Creed will conduct.

The Holme Valley Male-Voice Choir (seventy voices) will give a concert at Queen's Hall on February 2 at 8 p.m., singing works by Elgar, Holst, Vaughan Williams, Julius Harrison, Bantock, &c. Londoners should not miss this chance of hearing an outstanding body of singers.

At the Society of Women Musicians (74, Grosvenor Street, W.1) on February 16, Miss Katharine Kendall will give a demonstration of the new Emanuel Moor violin.

On February 6, at 8.15 p.m., at St. John's, Holland Road, Kensington, Dr. W. G. Alcock will give a recital on the organ rebuilt by Messrs. Henry Willis.

The Bach Prize at the Tobias Matthay Pianoforte School has been awarded to Nancy Saunders, Mr. Harold Samuel adjudicated.

TECHNIQUE
PIANOFORTE PLAYING
BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

Royal Oblong Quarto (organ music size); bound in cloth; 123 Examples and Exercises in clear music type; diagrams of the Standard Willis Board and Ellingford-Willis Board

The SCIENCE of ORGAN PEDALLING

By Herbert F. Ellingford, Mus.Bac.Oxon., and Ernest G. Meers, Mus.Bac.Oxon.

THE scope of this new book is so well foreshadowed in the Foreword, kindly written by Mr. Henry Willis, that we cannot do better than quote from it. We need only add that the Exercises and the wealth of Examples, drawn from writers of organ music of eminence in all departments, must make Mr. Ellingford's book indispensable to those who wish to attain proficiency in pedalling, and indeed to all who would secure acquaintance with the most approved methods.

THE technique of the player on the organ has advanced as much as that of the player on any other musical instrument. One hundred, or even seventy-five, years ago the organ was a very clumsy instrument to play upon; and, owing to difficulties of touch and lack of efficient control, it would have been impossible to attempt upon it the performance of the difficult music which is now demanded. However, to-day the manual touch of a first-class organ enables practically any music that is required to be played upon it.

The state of things with the pedals in the middle Victorian age was far worse than it was with the manuals. Hardly any two organ builders made their pedal-boards alike, either in scale or in relative position to the manuals; consequently, only a very limited pedal technique was possible. And although many passages from Bach's and Mendelssohn's organ works (which can hardly be called easy) were played in a fashion—mainly by toes, and with much crossing of the feet—still, I cannot think that some of the clumsy pedal-boards then in use allowed those passages to be phrased or played in a really artistic manner. In those days, most pedal-boards were flat, straight, and at the extreme of the compass most difficult to get at properly.

It will be admitted that the adoption of the concave and radiating pedal-board enabled a big advance in pedal technique to be made. I emphasize the point that, following improved facilities of control, comes improvement and greater skill on the part of the performer.

Many serious attempts have been made at further improvement, and examples may be given, all based on the "Willis" board. Mention should be made, however, of a modification which has been recommended by Mr. Ellingford, first used at Hanley Town Hall, in 1922, and lately adopted at the organ at St. George's Hall, Liverpool. This improvement has been to increase the concavity of the pedals, to lengthen and raise somewhat the short keys at the extreme ends of the pedal board. This certainly does appear to give greater facility than the standard "Willis" pattern, as owing to the greater concavity and the radiation of the sharps, the extreme notes are brought to a more convenient position for the feet, especially of a performer of short stature.

The wide range covered by this collection is surprising, and will undoubtedly appeal to the resourceful vocalist. There is a world of difference between the songs of Bach which open the book and those of Strauss that close it, and hardly less between the examples chosen from one and the same composer.

All the songs are edited and phrased according to Madame Schumann's own interpretation.

STAGE FRIGHT!

Because other people are nervous there is no reason why YOU should be.

THE

Mackinnon Method

banishes "nerves" and makes playing from memory a pleasure.

A Student writes:
"The greatest blessing is that the Method has given me confidence in my musical memory, and before I was convinced I possessed no musical memory at all!"—Oxford.

A Teacher writes:
"I myself am over fifty, and had never been able to memorise. Now, with the aid of your System, I am able to memorise and depend on my memory."—Shoreham.

An Amateur writes:
"My memory is now perfect, and I can play to anyone without fear of breaking down."—Durham.

A Professional writes:
"Thanks to you and your excellent and sound System, from always having been unpleasantly nervous on account of my memory, I played long programmes with comfort and assurance."—France.

The Method is recommended by famous musicians, including

CORTOT, MATTHAY, HESS, BAUER, TALICH, KOUSSEVITZKY

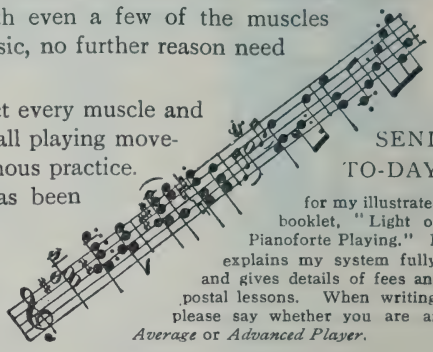
The Pianist's Hands

The Times says: "The excellence of Mr. Macdonald Smith's methods has been abundantly proved."

PREVALENT among pianists is the idea that you cannot play well unless you have a special sort of hand; this is a mistake. It is obvious, however, that the hands must be in perfect condition, otherwise the many technical difficulties to be overcome will be found insuperable. For a pianist every single muscle of the hands and arms must move the instant it is required to do so, and if this fails to be the case with even a few of the muscles brought into play in any complicated passage of music, no further reason need be sought to account for failure.

Let the "From Brain to Keyboard" System perfect every muscle and nerve in your hands and give you instant control over all playing movements without any of the usual drudgery and monotonous practice. Why not learn something about the System that has been used by many of our eminent musicians.



SEND TO-DAY

for my illustrated booklet, "Light on Pianoforte Playing." It explains my system fully, and gives details of fees and postal lessons. When writing, please say whether you are an Average or Advanced Player.

SIGHT-READING LESSONS

COMPLETE COURSE OF SIX POSTAL LESSONS

The Times: "Deals with the subject systematically from the first stage."

Music: "Goes fully and thoroughly into his subject from every possible standpoint. Cannot fail to be of service."

A PUPIL FROM CHINA WRITES: "My master is a gifted pianist, a minor genius, but he has not the least idea how he sight-reads, and cannot explain."

AFTER SECOND LESSON: "Your course has so far quite revolutionised my playing, and even now I am finding pieces far easier to sight-read."

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

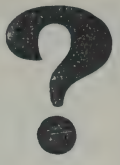
Candidates of either sex, being single and natives of Great Britain, or any part of Ireland, are eligible for election, provided that they are under the age of 30 on the 31st March, 1929, when the list of entries will be closed.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Hon. Secretary, MR. J. F. R. STAINER, THE OLD RECTORY, ASHTEAD, EPSOM.

Do You Know



Do You Know how to cure mind-wandering without any exhausting "effort of will?"

Do You Know of a simple method that will improve your Sight-reading powers to an unlimited extent?

Do You Know just when and why you should correct the phrase-marks of printed music?

Do You Know how to express fully through music your feeling, your imagination and your personality?

Do You Know how to increase greatly the stretch of your hands without any danger of straining them?

Do You Know how to gain fluent Technique with mental and muscular ease?

Do You Know how, when, and when not to use the "damper" pedal?

Do You Know that keyboard work may be much simplified by simplifying the methods of Fingering?

Do You Know how to make Scale-Practice not only interesting and useful, but musical?

MUSICAL SECRETS

NINE PAPERS by LILIAS MACKINNON

The above questions, and many others of equal importance to every player and teacher, are answered in a remarkable Series of Nine Papers, entitled "Musical Secrets," by MISS LILIAS MACKINNON. As a Teacher, Miss Mackinnon is well known, not only for her originality of thought, but for her simplicity of expression. As these papers are the outcome of her personal experience as Performer and Teacher, they contain practical suggestions of the greatest value, and ones which have never before been made available to the public.

The NINE PAPERS are these:

1. The Secret of Concentration in Practice
2. The Secret of Sight-reading
3. The Secret of Phrasing
4. The Secret of Interpretation
5. The Secret of Hand-Extension
6. The Secret of Technique
7. The Secret of Pedalling
8. The Secret of Fingering
9. The Secret of Scale-Practice

Nos. 1 to 5, for all Instrumentalists. Nos. 6 to 9, for Pianists only.

The price of each Paper is 2s. 6d., plus 2d. for postage (two or more post free); but the Complete Set of NINE, if taken together, may be had at the inclusive fee of £1. 1s.

An Organist writes, "Your Papers are priceless."—EASTBOURNE, 31/1/29.

PREPARATION BY CORRESPONDENCE

On a thoroughly individual system, ensuring to each Student the closest care and attention.

The following are a few extracts from successful pupils' letters:—

"The way you anticipated the form which the questions asked at the examination would take (and in some cases the actual questions themselves), is wonderful."

"This agreeable result is due to your skilful tuition, and to the skill and patience of yourself and staff I owe very much."

"I much appreciated all the papers you set me, and all the interesting notes without which I should most probably have failed."

AND FROM

STUDENTS IN COMPOSITION

L.R.A.M.—"I owe you a great debt of gratitude for your great help."

Student at University (after 1st Course).—"I should like to thank you for your splendid tuition in Harmony and Composition. It has been of inestimable value. The comments and explanations have proved invaluable."

Student in Composition.—"You have changed my whole outlook as regards composition."

L.R.A.M. and Composition.—"I can see the masterful touches, and there are touches of great beauty in your alterations. All you have done for me in Composition is scholarly."

Student in Modern Composition.—"I entirely agree with your exhortation and philosophy in the evolution of one's powers."

L.R.A.M., F.R.C.O., A.R.C.M., &c. (after 4th Lesson).—"I am glad to say that already I am able to do quicker and better Composition, due to your tuition and encouragement."

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

NOTE.—The booklet referred to above may be obtained free of all cost on application to Secretary, T., Cowling Institute, 71, Albion House, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1.

Are you Master of your Memory?

A bad memory is frequently the one thing which haunts many otherwise successful amateur and professional musicians—it is the one failing which is ever uppermost in their minds whenever they are expected to play. But Memorising can be taught, and I guarantee to teach you by my short Correspondence Course to play from Memory with ease, certainty, and confidence.

Take the first step by writing for my free Book and read the unsolicited testimony from delighted pupils of whom over 1,000 passed through my hands during the last twelve months. My Method will give you confidence.

"THE MASTER-METHOD OF MEMORY-PLAYING,"

MEMORISING CAN BE TAUGHT

Please state whether you play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ, and if you are a moderate or advanced player.

All smoking affects the throat!

Pipe, cigar or cigarette—no matter which—the delicate membranes of the throat object to smoke, which eventually produces irritation, either mild or severe. To prevent this, take an 'Allenburys' Glycerine and Black Currant Pastille occasionally between smokes and let it dissolve in the mouth. Containing pure glycerine and the luscious fruit juice of ripe black currants, they are delightfully soothing.

A. K. GLAZOUNOV

BY LEONID SABANEEV

To Glazounov has befallen a rare experience; during his lifetime he has become a historical figure, a part of musical history, and has been numbered amongst the musical saints. It must not be inferred from this that he is obsolete and belongs entirely to the past. No; his music has simply been canonized, and permanently added to the musical history of Russia and perhaps of the world. But the creator of this already classical and historical music still lives amongst us, and we can meet him and converse with him.

To me there is always something distressing in such a meeting, just because Glazounov is not a contemporary composer; I feel as though I were greeting Beethoven, or Wagner, or some musical myth, something to which our human, everyday standards do not apply. Nevertheless this myth lives, and actually talks, though but sparingly, as becomes a myth (even before he was a myth he had little to say), and this enhances the painful impression.

Beyond question Glazounov was and remains a brilliant figure in Russian musical history. And he was unexpected by his contemporaries. In the flourishing period of Russian impressionist romanticism, in the years of the cultivation of Russian operatic and vocal music, no one anticipated the sudden appearance of a powerful symphonist of the first rank, an instrumentalist and composer of very high technical and cultural endowments. Russian music, as we know, had always been developed along the line of the intensifying of dilettante principles, had always striven to accomplish certain unprecedented and autonomous paths in art. There were musical thinkers, such as Serov, who even asserted that in all probability there would never be any Russian symphonies, and that the future of Russian music lay in song and opera only. And suddenly there appears this tranquil academic symphonist, who ignores opera and descriptiveness and vocal music; a Russian Brahms, gifted with the technique of composition, with a titanic mastery which seems to have been born with him, the exact opposite of the famous 'mighty band,' from whom nevertheless he sprang. Rarely, perhaps, have the historical laws of the periodicity of musical styles and the contrast of adjacent musical periods stood out in such high relief as in the case of Glazounov. A pupil and spiritual son of Russian romantic impressionism, of the Russian national school known as the Kuchka, he proved to be antagonistic to it at every point. Even the fundamental quality of the kuchkisty—the national spirit—passed him by. Glazounov is possibly the most persistent internationalist and Westerner in Russian music. (Tchaikovsky, however, was rarely guilty of ethnographic nationalism.)

In place of the Kuchka's cult of nationalism he adopted (perhaps unconsciously, but so much the better for him), a neutral and extra-national Europeanism; in place of the cult of descriptiveness, the cult of absolute music; in place of amateurism, professionalism and even academicism; in place of the search for new paths, a devotion to the culture already attained by the West; in place of the furious pursuit of colouring, a graphic, neutral style, black and white instead of colour. Glazounov proved to be the unconscious negation of all the principles by which Russian art had existed prior to him, but this negation was organically indispensable to Russian music.

Perhaps from the very first his tastes were those of a wise moderation, from which all true musical conservatism springs. Glazounov is a conservative by nature, but not a reactionary. Conquests of the new are not foreign to him, though he himself does not achieve them intentionally. Always moderate in everything, he has no inclination for glaring colours; in his works the features of the prototypes whom he had to follow are constantly prominent. On the whole his music is mildly Wagnerian and Brahmsian, without the daring and titanic qualities of the former, and the straightforwardness of the latter; Glazounov's temperament was such that the titanic and th emotional were not natural to him. He is an artist of the architectural type. His creations are edifices, enduring in their cold and absolute beauty. He is not an objective artist who, like the kuchkisty and the impressionists, describes something external to himself, nor an individualist, such as Scriabin and Tchaikovsky, concerned only with his intimate thoughts and experiences. His tonal material is abstract, and its beauty lies in its abstractness. Glazounov has never written anything abnormal or unbeautiful; the grotesque, the caricature, the farce, are alien to him—he lives entirely in the kingdom of beautiful tonal lines. But every one may not care to remain for long in this chilly atmosphere, unwarmed by the presence of the living human spirit and its tragedy. Glazounov is not a tragedian, and tragedy is excluded from the scope of his music. He soothes the emotions, and by the touch of his mastery moderates tragedy of any kind, and turns it all into something proportionately beautiful.

His position in Russian history is therefore analogous to that of Mendelssohn in German music, and of Saint-Saëns in French music. It is an enlightened academicism in which everything is borrowed from the romantics, nothing is exaggerated, and the whole is made smooth and even by the great skill of the composer. To the emotionalist, such music has little to say; it seems defective, and does not justify itself and its designation; he feels that its tranquil beauty is lacking in motive. But I doubt whether anyone can deny that the appearance of such geniuses in the history of music is necessary, and perhaps especially necessary in so impetuous and unbalanced a sphere as that represented by the young musical culture of Russia.

Glazounov, like Mendelssohn, came into the world fully equipped and possessed of an innate mastery. It would seem strange to talk of his pupilage. Of whom, indeed, could he learn, when the great composers then on the Russian horizon had neither mastery nor technique, or, if they had, it was some specific knowledge for personal use? Glazounov acquired his musical skill of himself, and therefore could only be a teacher, and not a pupil; and in actual fact the kuchkisty themselves admitted that they had something to learn from him. It would, however, be more correct to say that Glazounov himself, as well as his tutors, the kuchkisty, realised neither his significance nor his rôle as a refreshing draught in the burning desert of Russian musicality. His sphere is a calm and peaceful æstheticism, but an æstheticism free from affectation, healthy and full-blooded. Consequently his defection from opera, the field of Russian musical activity from time immemorial, to the impassively beautiful realm of the ballet was a matter of chance. Possibly this ballet outlook, this sense of the world as a cold and beautiful legend, constitutes the fundamental note of his life, of which Glazounov, like Mendelssohn, has had no cause to complain. The combination of beautiful tonal lines and the beautiful lines of the human figure and its movements is quite natural. We have here emotion and feeling (which merely provide an occasion for more whimsical ornamentation), but never that weariness of the spirit, that contact with the depths, so characteristic of the Russian soul. Glazounov's symphonies are ballet entr'actes or incompletely embodied ballets, just as his ballets are choreographic symphonies. In them we hear nothing of the heroic and epic spirit of the Beethoven symphony; they resemble—all of them—the apotheoses of the ballet, and are like triumphal, festal music carried to the limits of artistry. Glazounov is the poet of the sumptuous festival of life, of the splendour of colours, lines, and tones, but a splendour free from extravagance and at the same time monumental and inspiring. It is the splendour of Russian imperialism, and Glazounov's musical structures have something in common with the architectural style of his native city, St. Petersburg—the same durability and exceptional solidity, the monumentalness, the absence of anything clamant or provocative, the proud repose and granite coldness of the Northern capital in which his genius grew up and gathered strength; the same internationalism with which the window broken through upon Europe by Peter the Great glitters; and the same rôle is played by Glazounov's music, also in its way a window upon Europe—the window of Russian music through which, almost for the first time, it found an organic communication with the great channel of European mastery. And this creative work is as abstract, and sometimes as oppressively cold, as the majestic colonnades of St. Isaac's Cathedral and the vast Winter Palace: on it is stamped, possibly against the will of its creator, the same idea of a sort of overwhelming authority, of a stern, inhuman, calm imperialism.

Just as St. Petersburg, in spite of its western quality, is a Russian city, so Glazounov, a St. Petersburg composer, is in the final reckoning a Russian composer. He was not one of those who cannot separate their work from their life, such as were the majority of the great Russian artists, for whom art was the confession of the soul, the tormenting revelation of it to the crowd, greedy without knowing why, for some mystical experience. Glazounov's life and soul do not find expression in his creative work; for him life and creative work are independent entities. It is difficult to conceal the fact that these very qualities of his genius have usually been accepted as defects; Russia and the West have always expected of a Russian musician these revelations of the spirit, either personal or national, and it is impossible to find them in Glazounov. He is a Westerner, but the lawful son of Russian musical culture.

His style, as I have already stated, was born with him, and therefore has undergone but insignificant changes. His mastery was enhanced and attained its culmination in the last Symphonies (the sixth, seventh, and eighth), but the type of music persisted. In this mastery, in the ease with which he solved the most complex problems of musical construction, Glazounov reminds us again of Mendelssohn and Mozart. His solution is so clear, so luminous, so musical, that one is not even conscious of the difficulties, and the listener who hears the beautiful, luscious music has no suspicion of the brain-racking work involved in the polyphony. One has only to recall the seventh and eighth Symphonies in order to be convinced of the extent of Glazounov's mastery of the task of the contrapuntist—to combine very great complexity and extremely beautiful and lucid form. As contrapuntists all other Russian composers cannot but appear puny in comparison with him; he was the first in Russia to bridle the untractable steed of polyphony and make it as quiet as a lamb.

The first stage of Glazounov's creative work retains traces of the influence of Kuchka, displayed in a lingering inclination for programme music ('The Kremlin,' 'Stenka Razin,' 'The Sea'), for descriptiveness, for orchestral colour ('The Sea' was written for an augmented orchestra). Subsequently all this disappears in symphonism. Until lately the number of Glazounov's compositions in the orchestral sonata form has exceeded that of any other Russian composer, but in this respect (we will say nothing as to quality) Myaskovsky is beginning to rival, and even to surpass him. If we turn to the inner content of Glazounov's symphonies, however, it will appear that in spite of their 'ballet' psychology they are perhaps the most symphonic in Russian music. Borodin's symphonies sound like symphonized opera entr'actes; Tchaikovsky's are on the whole symphonic lyrics, and too individual; whilst Scriabin's, notwithstanding their regular sonata form, are programmatic symphonic poems. Glazounov alone has raised the standard of Russian symphonism pure and simple, and only in him do we find the idea of the symphony as a form simultaneously grandiose, epic, and ingenious, inclined neither to the lyrical, nor to the programmatic, nor to the prolixity of the impressionists. It is early to speak of the symphonies of the new composer Myaskovsky, or of the still more youthful Shostakovich, upon whom criticism has not yet pronounced its verdict. The symphonism of Prokofiev, notwithstanding the unquestionable merits of his music, seems to me but little symphonic.

Glazounov originated and completed a period of Russian instrumentalism. His influence on Russian music cannot be doubted, in spite of the fact that his outlook was foreign to the majority of his successors. He influenced even the ardent and enthusiastic Scriabin, whose æsthetic credo was the exact opposite of Glazounov's. But Glazounovism as a tendency has proved to be infertile, as is usual in the case of titans and geniuses who have too thoroughly embodied in their creative work the idea underlying their outlook on the world. The general traits of the succeeding generations of Russian musicians, though not unaffected by Glazounov, have been developed in defiance of his artistic trend. The most brilliant of them and the nearest to Glazounov is Myaskovsky.

Glazounov's talent attained its fullest development in 'Raimonda' and the sixth Symphony, his mastery in the seventh and eighth Symphonies. It is an instructive and interesting fact that his music, though apparently without positive signs distinguishing it from any other, has a characteristic, a sort of integral physiognomy of its own, again with a resemblance to city architecture. Glazounov builds his musical edifices without any intention of creating a new style; he merely levels and polishes, as it were, the styles already existing; and yet the result is peculiar to himself. In the same way the architects who imitated the baroque and empire of their day unwittingly worked out the genuine 'Russian empire' style (the 'St. Petersburg style').

During the years immediately preceding the war, and almost throughout the revolution, Glazounov was silent and wrote nothing. In this he shares the fate of his younger contemporary, Rachmaninov. I think their silence is due to similar causes—both have prematurely become historical figures; both have felt with all the sensitiveness of great artists their isolation in the new musical world and their inability honestly to conform to it. Both are fine and sincere artists, who adhere to conservative principles where their art is concerned. Glazounov was not always in sympathy with the music of the later Wagner, and Strauss, Debussy, and Scriabin were ever foreign to him, though in Scriabin the gifted composer of 'Raimonda' may at times have been vaguely conscious of some other musical truth with which he was unfamiliar. Rimsky-Korsakov was more compliant and more sensitive to modernism than Glazounov, who is slow to change, and who could not but realise that his music had already become a part of history, and that subsequent history would follow other and strange paths with which he had no sympathy. Possibly a great and gifted musician such as Glazounov might have pretended to belong to the extreme left and have worked on the new lines, but he, like Rachmaninov, was prevented from doing so by his absolute musical honesty, the honesty of an artist to himself, a quality with which many are nowadays unacquainted. Glazounov could not follow the modernism of the new impressionists, the Russian Debussyists and Scriabinists, nor the latest generations of Russian music of the Prokofiev and Stravinsky type, and he became silent, preferring to retire into the living history of Russian music with the traits which had created that very history, rather than with a tardy and incomprehensible grimace disown his musical ego.

And so one of the greatest of Russian composers has held his peace for nearly fifteen years, and this silence strengthens the impression which he gives us of a living monument. His last creations include the music to 'The King of the Jews' and 'Salome'; in them he is on the verge of an attempt to reconcile his outlook with certain new tendencies (preferably Strauss's), but evidently they do not satisfy him, and he sinks into a silence which reminds us of Rossini's famous submergence in an artistic Nirvana, but which is dictated by entirely different impulses—Glazounov, that typical professional composer, is the last person whom one could reproach with artistic indolence.

The silence of Rachmaninov and Glazounov breathes of tragedy. Is it only the personal tragedy of two composers who are behind the times, who have said their say and feel the uselessness of repeating themselves, or can we foresee in it still more tragical prospects for art in general? The silence of these great musicians is accompanied not only by a sense of the inutility of their own creative work, but also by an unmistakable perplexity with regard to the whole of the contemporary output. Has music really advanced, and do only the laggards fail to understand the paths which it follows, or has it merely gone astray, with the connivance of those by whom it is surrounded? It is very difficult to find an answer at the moment, but it is significant that more and more frequently I have occasion to witness the frank and naïve enthusiasm of musicians and audiences at performances of Glazounov's symphonies, which above all things are musically beautiful; they seem like a new revelation, a vision of paradise, after the tortures to which the ears of the patient and submissive herd of listeners are subjected by modernist composers. Glazounov may or may not have grown old with his music, but we do know that he has a niche in the Pantheon of history. How the contemporary experiments on our much-enduring ears will end, and what place is prepared for them in history, we are quite unable to say, and we cannot look for an answer until ten, twenty, or even more years have elapsed.

(Translated by S. W. Pring.)

ANTONIO CALDARA (1670-1736)

By Cecil Gray

One of the most serious blemishes in the third edition of Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' is undoubtedly the omission of any reference to Antonio Caldara. Whether it is to be regarded as intentional or due merely to some unaccountable oversight is difficult to say, but seeing that his name appeared in the previous editions of the work we shall probably be right in assuming the former. In either case, however, it is to be hoped that this defect will be remedied in the next edition, for although his admirable aria 'Come raggio del Sol' may be the only specimen of his art that has capriciously survived up to the present day in our concert programmes, Caldara is by no means an obscure or unknown composer. On the contrary, his best work, and notably that of it written for the Church, has always received the respectful attention it deserves from all students of the age in which he lived. Indeed, there can be little doubt in the mind of any one who is acquainted, however superficially, with Caldara's music, that he is one of the most important figures of the period immediately preceding Bach and Handel, and one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, of the Italian masters at the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th centuries.

Of his life we know extremely little, and what we do know is not of great interest. He was born at Venice in 1670, and became a pupil of Legrenzi, one of the leading composers and teachers of the day. His first opera was produced in his native city with great success at the early age of eighteen, and the next thirty years or so of his life were spent in various Italian cities—Rome, Milan, Mantua, Bologna, &c.—in the course of which he acquired a great reputation both as a 'cellist, in which capacity he was reckoned among the foremost virtuosi of his day, and as a composer of operas and chamber music. In 1712 we find him at Vienna, in 1715 at Madrid, and finally at Vienna again, where he occupied the post of vice-chapelmaster under the celebrated contrapuntist Fux to the Emperor Charles VI., a post which he continued to occupy until his death, in 1736.

The greater part of his work is equally unknown to us, and like that of so many other composers of the period lies scattered in manuscript in various libraries and private collections throughout the whole of Europe. Consequently, to become acquainted with his entire output, comprising over seventy operas, thirty oratorios, thirty Masses both a cappella and instrumentally accompanied, to say nothing of a vast quantity of chamber music and miscellaneous compositions for church purposes, would in itself be the task of a lifetime. According to the most recent edition of Riemann's 'Musik-Lexikon' (1922), a German musicologist, Herr Felix von Kraus, is actually engaged on the task, but up to the present time, so far as I am aware, his promised monograph has not yet appeared.

In default, therefore, of the data provided by a reliable, first-hand examination of the existing works in manuscript, we are compelled to rely exclusively upon the meagre fare afforded by such of Caldara's works as were published in his lifetime, and those that have been reprinted in modern editions. The first category would seem to consist of merely twenty-four Sonatas for two violins and bass (1700-01), and a collection of two- and three-voice Motets with basso continuo (1715), to which may be added a book of Masses with instrumental accompaniment published shortly after his death. Modern reprints, apart from innumerable arrangements of the aria already mentioned ('Come raggio del Sol'), are practically confined to the invaluable large volume of his Church music published in the series 'Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich' (XIII. Jahrgang, Erster Teil), by Eusebius Mandyczewsky in 1906, a fine Fugue for accompanied voices in the 'Auswahl vorzüglicher Musik-Werke' (No. 41), and two specimens of his chamber music contained in Riemann's 'Collegium Musicum' (No. 44) and in the same editor's 'Musikgeschichte in Beispielen.'

This may perhaps seem to be too small an amount of material on which to base even so modest and unpretentious a study as this of the work of such an exceptionally prolific composer as Caldara. It may legitimately be questioned, however, whether it is ever really necessary to know all, or even most of, any man's work in order to form a reliable estimate of his talent.

We do not need to wade conscientiously through the complete works of a Beethoven or a Schubert in order to appreciate their greatness or the nature of their intrinsic qualities. In each case a few selected works will serve just as well—perhaps even better, when we consider the vast amount of inferior stuff that each turned out which would be better forgotten—and the same applies with even greater cogency to lesser men. In the second place it must be remembered that it is a characteristic of the age in which Caldara lived that composers, in contra-distinction to those mentioned above, maintained a remarkably consistent level of accomplishment, and that not until the second part of the 18th century, generally speaking (there may be a few exceptions), do we find a wide gulf separating the best of a man's work from his worst. Consequently, even if we had the entire output of Caldara at our disposal it is improbable that the final impression we would receive of his talent would differ appreciably from that based upon a mere handful of compositions chosen more or less at random. It is true that what we have of it does not enable us to form any idea concerning his merits as a composer of operas, but seeing that there is general agreement among those who have most closely studied his music to the effect that he is first and foremost a composer of Church music, this deficiency need not trouble us overmuch. Certainly what we know of his chamber music—and that is a good deal—bears out this contention, for admirable though many of his trio sonatas may be, they cannot be said to equal the finest chamber works of such predecessors and contemporaries as Corelli, Veracini, Locatelli, or Vivaldi. In what we know of his Church music, on the other hand, he can stand comparison with any composer of his age. The 'Denkmäler' volume of his Church music may therefore be said to supply us with sufficient material to enable us to form at least a rough idea of the general characteristics of his art, and to serve as the basis for a comparison between him and his most eminent contemporaries in respect of stature and significance.

In his erudite introduction to the volume in question, Mandyczewski justly praises Caldara for his superb melodies, 'of which the noble, soaring lines, the architectural construction, and the deep expressiveness of the words, stamp them as belonging to the finest of a period exceptionally rich in melody.' That this is not excessive praise can be readily ascertained by any one willing to take the trouble of looking at the works for himself; to give sufficient quotations in justification of this contention would require more space than can be here afforded, for it is not a question of an outstanding phrase here and there, which could be easily detached from its context like an epigram, but of a consistent, homogeneous melodic flow from first bar to last of each composition.

Mandyczewski goes on to say that the rhythmic and harmonic interest of Caldara's work is, on the contrary, comparatively small. The first part of this statement is probably justified; nowhere in his work do we find the rhythmic vitality and inventiveness of some of his compatriots such as Vivaldi or Marcello. This deficiency, however, is to a great extent only the outcome of his qualities, for a high degree of rhythmic interest is incompatible with the particular vein of mysticism and introspection which is characteristic of all his best work, in this selection at least. This quality, incidentally, distinguishes him sharply from all his Italian colleagues, save occasionally Lotti, and might perhaps be accounted for by his long residence in Vienna, and his consequent absorption to a certain extent of Teutonic characteristics. On the other hand it must be remembered that at this time Vienna was the reverse of Teutonic in its culture and artistic ideals, and we shall consequently be safer in assuming that this striking feature of Caldara's work is essentially individual and personal.

That Mandyczewski should, however, find a lack of harmonic interest in Caldara's music is distinctly surprising, to say the least, for it is precisely the strength and audacity of his harmonic writing, and in particular his great mastery of chromatic resource, that strike one most strongly on looking at his work for the first time. Not that he is exceptional in this respect; indeed, the best Italian masters of the period are often extremely interesting harmonically, and not at all the mere insipid melodists they are commonly supposed to be. Caldara's chromaticism, however, is peculiarly individual, and not confined simply to the exploitation of the semi-tonally descending—or, less frequently, ascending—bass, which is one of the most popular and fruitful formulas of the period beginning with Purcell (or even earlier) and ending with Bach. He certainly makes use of it to a certain extent, and with great effect, like all his colleagues, but his more highly personal progressions are arrived at very differently, in a more deliberately colouristic manner. Particularly characteristic of his style, for example, is his predilection for the progression from the flattened sixth of the scale to the augmented fourth, generally in the bass part, as in the following extracts : *

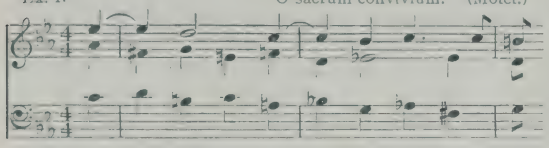
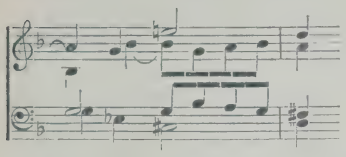
Ex. 1. 'O sacrum convivium.' (Motet.)



Ex. 2. 'Stabat Mater.'

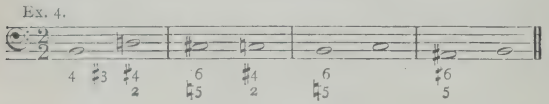


'Stabat Mater.'

Ex. 3.

He is also extremely fond of a chain of unresolved, descending chromatic sevenths, as indicated in the following figured bass :

Ex. 4.



and a more elaborate and truly magnificent example of the use of the device is to be found at the end of his 'Crucifixus,' which is quoted on p. 215 et seq.

It would obviously be absurd to suggest that these progressions are in any way unique, or even that they are not to be found frequently enough in the work of other composers of the same period. There is probably no single harmonic progression in the whole of music, any more than there is an isolated melodic phrase or rhythmical formula, that has never been used save by one man alone—or if there is it is fairly safe to say that it must be a very bad one. The fact remains that the habitual and consistent employment of such progressions as those quoted above, and the highly personal way in which they are handled, impart a curiously poignant expressiveness and a particular shade of mystical intensity to Caldara's work that one does not easily find elsewhere.

Nevertheless, despite the great beauty of his melody and the power and individuality of his harmony it is probably his ability to reconcile the claims of both these elements with the exigencies of an intricate and finely-wrought polyphonic texture that constitutes Caldara's chief title to lasting fame. In this respect his 'Crucifixus' in sixteen real parts is one of the most remarkable works ever written. For it is not as if, like practically all other contrapuntal feats in a large number of parts, it was a mere exhibition of barren mathematical ingenuity, consisting almost entirely of a perpetual oscillation between tonic and dominant harmonies, and entirely devoid of musical interest of any kind. On the contrary, it is a work of intrinsic beauty, all technical considerations apart, and it is difficult to say which to admire the most : the beauty and expressiveness of the themes, the superb harmonic structure, or the consummate ease and mastery with which he handles such a vast number of voices. It is only at the cadences (where it is obviously unavoidable) that any strain or artificiality in the movement of the individual parts makes itself felt ; otherwise they progress as naturally, logically, and inevitably as if there were only four or five of them to consider. The stupendous nature of such an achievement from the technical point of view can perhaps be fully appreciated only by those who retain painful recollections of their efforts in student days to write strict scholastic counterpoint in even such a comparatively small number of parts as seven or eight. For Caldara takes no liberties with the strict style save for the employment of hidden fifths or octaves, and consecutives by contrary motion. (Two parts moving from a unison to an octave, for example, or vice versâ.) The concluding bars of this superb composition are reprinted on the pages following this article. It is given in full score, as, owing to the continual and intricate crossing of parts, its linear beauty can be properly appreciated only when thus set forth.

Although his fine Te Deum for two four-part choirs and orchestral accompaniment of clarini, trumpets, drums, first and second violins, violas, and trombones, shows that he was, on occasions, capable of great brilliance, it will generally be found that Caldara excels in the treatment of rather sombre themes, especially those associated with the Passion. Particularly noteworthy in this respect are the nobly expressive motets 'Laboravi in gemitu meo' and 'Miserere mei Domine,' for three voices and basso continuo, while his 'Stabat Mater,' from which the opening has been quoted above, is a consummate masterpiece from beginning to end, and worthy to be placed among the finest works of the period. The 'Missa Dolorosa' also, though slightly more florid in style, is scarcely if at all inferior. All things considered, however, it is undoubtedly the great 'Crucifixus' that represents the highest point to which Caldara attains ; a work which, in nobility and grandeur of conception and sheer technical mastery, has few if any parallels in the entire literature of music.

* The organ part, indicated by a bass part only in the original, is omitted for reasons of space. It merely serves to fill in the chords and double the vocal parts.

SCIENTISTS AND MUSICIANS

By Katharine E. Eggar

One of the most penetrating books on Beethoven which the centenary brought forth was written by a man of science. I refer to J. W. N. Sullivan's 'Beethoven: his Spiritual Development,' and I refer to it not in order to speculate as to whether we have musicians capable of analysing the work and mental or spiritual processes of some great physicist or chemist, but because the writing of this book showed up very strikingly the difference in vitality between Modern Natural Science and Modern Music.

Modern Science matters intensely to our age: Modern Music matters hardly at all.

The reason of this is not, in my opinion, merely the inherent difference in the allotted spheres of Art and Science—not any invidious shallow distinction between the Useful and the Ornamental—but simply that while scientists have trained themselves to recognise realities, musicians have allowed that faculty to atrophy. It is because of their failure to keep alive their finest sensibilities that there is so much confusion, superficiality, and insincerity in musical thought to-day. There is a general musical scepticism potent among us which explains why (to quote Leonid Sabaneev) 'the cult of a musical inventive faculty devoid of feeling' is able to claim the most prominent place in contemporary composition; why the generality of people listen to most modern music 'with curiosity but without pleasure or enthusiasm.'

Now, nothing could be less true than to say of scientists that they regard the results of modern research in their subject 'with curiosity but without pleasure or enthusiasm.' It is not the scientific people of to-day who are chilly and dry; it is they who are excited and delighted over their work, and the reason is that they know they are dealing with realities. Musicians get no such assurance from the latest developments of their art.

Of course the objection may be raised at this point that Natural Science is the only study which does deal with reality, and that Art in its essence is concerned with unreality. It may be argued also that it is only the practical application of scientific discoveries to money-making or comfort-gaining that excites and delights. The latter argument has no application to the pure artistic enthusiasm of the modern physicist or chemist, or the contemplative rapture of the modern mathematician; and with regard to the question of reality, we do not find Science nowadays claiming the kind of reality for matter which precludes reality for things of Art. There was a time, and not very long ago, when the physicist thought that he was dealing with a 'real, objectively existing universe, in the sense that in the absence of consciousness it would be very much the same as it appeared to be': but the most recent investigations of matter have led to a very different conception.

'The real universe, according to relativity theory, is a four-dimensional world of point-events. Of the nature of point-events we know nothing. All that we require to know, for the purposes of physics, is that it takes four numbers to specify a point-event uniquely, and that some kind of structure—a minimum amount of structure—may be postulated of the world of point-events. We then find, purely by mathematical processes, that certain characteristics of this world will have the quality of permanence. The mind, faced by this world of evanescent point-events, selects those characteristics that are permanent as being of special interest . . . . In consequence of this predilection of the mind there arises space and time, matter, and the laws of nature . . . . [But] the real world of point-events has many other characteristics to which the mind pays no attention.' *

Now, however bleak and lifeless such a statement may seem alongside of the marvellous world on which we open our physical eyes, no artistic person ought to quarrel with it, for it is Science's way of saying what only poets dared to say before. 'Things are not what they seem,' said Longfellow: 'Things only seem to be what we see because of the way our minds are made,' says Science.

There was a witty riddle of the last century which ran:

> What is matter? Never mind.
> What is mind? No matter.

If Science would hesitate to-day to give either answer, she certainly ought to be credited with having established the supreme importance of mind in the universe; and for this vindication of mind, and, incidentally, of the things of the mind, all artists ought to be profoundly grateful. The courage and patience of scientists ought to make us ashamed of the feeble fight we are making for our own principles; but we do not seem to grasp the situation—to understand that though scientists have had all their old supports knocked away from under them, though the once unassailable foundations of our world, time and space, have been deprived of their old significance, the result has been to give scientists a new hold on reality. They are realising that a new world is opening up to them. But what is the position of musicians to-day? Without any such assault on their foundations, they have grown flabby in their grasp of essentials; and whereas Science has been becoming more and more alive, music has become less and less certain of any vital power.

What is the reason of this lack of force in musical authority?

I do not attempt to answer the question for any other country, but it is not at all surprising that England should have lost faith in the spiritual reality of music if one looks at our peculiar history during the last two hundred years. Not only were we being gradually drilled by foreigners into the conviction that we were 'not a musical nation'; not only was our faith in our musical integrity gradually destroyed—we ourselves appeared to give the culminating evidence to outside opinion by bringing forth, at a time when Science was rising to supreme eminence in the world's thought, a great scientist for whom music had no meaning. On a nation sure of itself in music, Darwin's famous pronouncement on the faculties of enjoying or producing musical notes as not being 'of the least use to man in reference to his daily habits of life' would have made no impression, but with us it created an uneasy feeling of shame—music was evidently a poor thing in the scheme of evolution. Of course, if only we had not been so stunned by these few words and had been able to pay attention to the concluding portion of Darwin's dictum—that these faculties 'must be ranked among the most mysterious with which man is endowed'—we might have been roused to an adequate scientific curiosity with regard to what was so mysterious even to Darwin. But our lack of curiosity in relation to the musical faculty, although it does not excuse, does to some extent explain, the musician's attitude to-day; and my contention is that we need now to tackle the problems of the musical mystery with the same determination and belief as have been brought to bear on the material mystery. We certainly need something to happen in musical life which shall be equivalent to the discovery of the electric field in natural science.

Is there any reason to suppose that the experience of Science may be echoed in Music? Given the same honesty, the same faith, and the same ardour of study, there is surely every reason to hope that it would be similarly rewarded. Briefly and roughly, the experience of Science has been this: for a long time scientists studied Nature as being composed of indestructible atoms of matter, and following these lines they eventually arrived at an impasse from which they were delivered by the discovery of the 'field' theory, after which they found they had to study Nature as being the result of the play of indestructible energy. The consolidation of this discovery has revolutionised scientific thought. It is not too much to say that a similar discovery in relation to music would transform musical thought, composition, and reception to an almost inconceivable extent. I say a 'similar' discovery, and I am not attempting to define the discovery; but it is surely obvious that there is all the difference between juggling ad infinitum with arrangements of notes (which is what musical composition is developing into) and discovering the secret of the energy concealed in sound—a thing about which we know absolutely nothing, as is proved by our indifference to noise. If Science and Art could illumine each other over sound, we should have a new Music.

ORGAN PEDALLING, PAST AND PRESENT

Michael Prætorius (who, as you will at once remember, flourished from 1571 to 1621) wrote this concerning a subject on which there has always been much learned argument:

> 'Many think it is a matter of great importance, and despise such organists as do not use this or that particular fingering, which in my opinion is not worth the talk: for let a player run up and down with either first, middle, or third finger (aye! even with his nose if that could help him), provided everything is done clearly, correctly, and gracefully, it does not much matter how or in what manner it is accomplished.'

Which was sound sense in Michael's day, when keyboard music was comparatively simple, and when only three fingers (and the nose) had to be considered. There is a good deal in it even now, when we use all five fingers pretty equally, instead of reserving the thumb and little finger for the first and last notes of a scale. And if we are right in refusing to be bound to a system in fingering, we are still more so in organ pedalling.

I have always felt this when faced with pages of pedal scales and arpeggios, and I am reminded of it by a work just published—'The Science of Organ Pedalling,' by Herbert F. Ellingford and Ernest G. Meers (Musical Opinion Office, 6*s*.).

Mr. Ellingford is no doubt right in saying that until as recently as 1900 there was no system in pedalling. We might even say that the speculative method is still used by many players. The letter (quoted by Mr. Ellingford) from a 'prominent organist, composer, and examiner,' written in 1917 apropos of Ellingford's 'Pedal Scales and Arpeggios for the Organ' (Novello, 2*s*. 6*d*.), expresses the common attitude in regard to pedalling:

> 'Very likely there are all sorts of possibilities of advanced modern pedal technique. I have never thought about it much, and personally feel that I owe any facility I may have on the pedal-board less to exercises than to a diligent study of "But the waters," from "Israel in Egypt," as arranged by W. T. Best.'

In other words, he developed agility, and let system go hang.

There was, and still is, justification for this attitude. A pianist knows that he will never meet with more than one type of keyboard so far as measurements are concerned, and this state of uniformity has lasted long enough for the fingering of scales and arpeggios to be systematised.

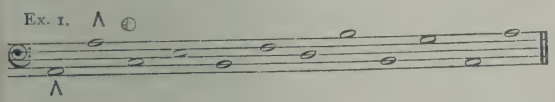
But although there is at last general agreement as to the form and measurements of the pedal-board (I presume the great majority would favour the Willis board), there is no 'official' type; and a player who sets out on a short recital tour may have to adapt himself to half-a-dozen different measurements. Even the adjustable seat is far from being common. A long-legged player who recites on a strange organ often finds that the short and stumpy regular occupant uses a cut-down bench that the newcomer has to adapt by such insecure and wobbling aids as a few strips of wood and some disused hymn-books. When the visitor is short and the stool too high, there is nothing to be done. He must keep pecking away with his toes, and if the pedal-board happens to be of the old flat type, the playing of the extreme notes is a fatiguing and risky adventure. Everything, then, is against systematic pedalling.

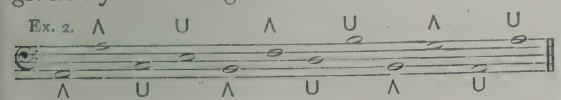
Yet Mr. Ellingford is right in emphasising the importance of system, and it is certain that the player who goes to work on the principles laid down in this book will be better able to adapt himself to strange pedal-boards than he who is haphazard, or content with the old method of letting the toes do practically all the work, with the inevitable result of much unnecessary and tiring crossing of the feet. Beyond a doubt, the plan of using the heels liberally is sound, safe, and economical. I am now so completely out of the organ-lesson world that I don't know whether the old toe method persists. Mr. Ellingford implies that it does. He quotes this as a typical exercise given to students as a means of becoming familiar with the middle of the keyboard:

Ex. 1.



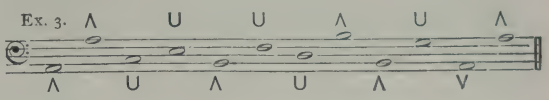
When I was a youngster this would have been pedalled with toes only, but I should have thought that to-day most teachers would be well aware of the advantages of the footing given by Mr. Ellingford:

Ex. 2.



The test of this is to play the two lines of notes separately. The use of toes alone necessitates a lateral movement of the leg for each note, whereas the heeling of alternate notes calls for little exertion beyond an oblique movement of the foot. Mr. Ellingford's marking, however, is not the only convenient one. I am inclined to think that the following is even better, inasmuch as the step from F to B is easier with the right toe pointing up the keyboard:

Ex. 3.

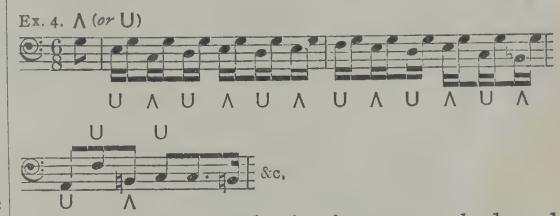


Again the test is to play the top line of notes alone. I think there can be no doubt that the use of the heel on consecutive notes (E and F) leads to a more comfortable playing of the B-A-G.

Clearly, there can never be anything like the same finality about pedalling as there is about fingering. In addition to the variableness of pedal-boards, there are differences in length of feet; even the height of the boot heel, the width of the welt, and the shape of the toe, are factors. Nevertheless, every player will find much to help him in this Ellingford-Meers book. If it does no more than make him do a bit of thinking about a matter that is usually taken for granted and left to chance, it will benefit him.

I am inclined to feel that Mr. Ellingford is less of a pioneer than he imagines in this matter of using the heels liberally. The principle was advocated in Eaglefield Hull's 'Organ Playing,' published as long ago as 1911, though Hull did not develop it very fully. I remember discussing it with Charles Quef, at Paris, in 1912, especially in regard to the footing of this passage from Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C:

Ex. 4.



Hull's book gave the footing as marked, and there was a good deal of correspondence about it in Musical Opinion. I forget the details, but my impression is that many old players stoutly maintained that the passages should be played with toes throughout! Organ students of to-day hardly realise how exclusively players of the past pedalled with the toes. And the genus dies hard, even in Germany, apparently. Mr. Meers says:

> 'I was with a really great continental organist at Hamburg a few years ago. This man, who appeared to play nearly all the works of Bach from memory, seemed rarely to use his heels, but trotted up and down the pedal-board on his toes. He played in a most masterly way Bach's D major Prelude and Fugue and G major Prelude, and other works, all from memory. I deferentially asked him why he did his pedalling that way, and on his asking what I meant I got on the stool and played two or three scales, luckily for me, quickly and cleanly. He said, "Ah, very good indeed. But I aim at individuality. I pedal in the way that comes easiest to me." He had very small feet, and pedalled so quickly and cleanly that it reminded one of a ballet girl tripping across the stage on her toes.'

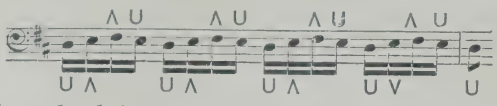
On the other hand, Mr. Meers says he has watched Dr. Hollins starting some of the sequential passages in the D major Fugue with his heels, 'and playing them with great certainty and clearness.'

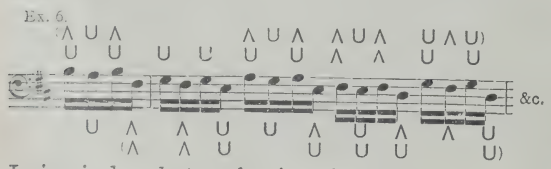
This D major Fugue is quoted a good deal, and I am bound to say that some of the footing strikes me as being awkward. For example:

Ex. 5.



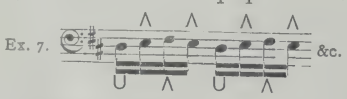
Here the left toe on the E is apt to foul the right foot—at all events my right foot. It seems more natural to start the passage with the toe. I shall go on preferring to give the E-F-E to the right heel-toe-heel. Again, I cannot see the advantage of using alternate feet throughout the whole of the sequence that follows:

Ex. 6.



I give in brackets a footing that seems to me to be easier and less fussy. Going back to those opening notes, there is much to be said for the plan Mr. Meers says was shown him (by Parratt?) when he was a pupil at the R.C.M.:

Ex. 7.



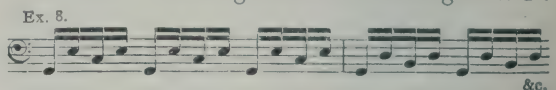
This belongs to the 'dodge' type of pedalling—a handy way of getting over the ground that is worthy of more serious notice than has so far been given to it in instruction books. Similarly, this Ellingford-Meers treatise has little or nothing to say concerning the change of foot on a note without re-striking. Much crossing of feet can be avoided in this way. I am glad to see, however, that Mr. Ellingford prints diagrams of the feet with 'footing-units' marked. He gives no fewer than nine to each foot. Too little notice has hitherto been taken of the important part played by the sides of the feet. Judging from the average primer, one would think that all the work was done by toe and heel. Yet every experienced player knows that a great deal of valuable sliding duty is done by the sides. I have an idea that this kind of thing has been regarded as being 'not quite good form'—the kind of thing that we all do, but don't like to put on paper.

The evolution of pedal technique in England is so recent that it can be traced fairly easily. Seeing that we were about four hundred years behind the Continent in adopting the pedal-board, it seems odd that we didn't take over the technique as well. But we didn't. As Dr. Pearce shows in his interesting booklet, 'The Evolution of the Pedal Organ' (Musical Opinion Office, 2*s*.), we were as slow in getting on with using the board as in adopting it. The old hands looked scornfully on the new-fangled contrivance, and went on faking things with skilful left hands. Sir George Smart was asked in 1851 to try one of the pedal organs at the Exhibition. 'My dear sir,' he replied, 'I never in my life played on a gridiron!' Pearce quotes the advertisement on p. 1 of the Wesley-Horn edition of the Bach Trio-Sonatas (arranged as pianoforte duets), issued in 1809: 'The following Trio was designed for the Organ, and performed by the matchless Author in a very extraordinary manner. The first and second Treble Parts he played with both Hands on two Sets of Keys, and the Base (wonderful as it appears) he executed entirely upon Pedals, without assistance.' This was only a little over a hundred years ago!

One hindrance was the early type of board used in this country. It was often of the short-key type that could be played by toes only. I recently came across a village organ that had a board of this early species, consisting of an octave of notes, so short that there was no room for heeling. They were, in fact, hardly any better than the set added to the organ in Halberstadt Cathedral in 1495, a picture of which was given by Prætorius in his 'Syntagma Musicum' (1515), and is reprinted in Pearce's book. No doubt all the early boards were of the toe kind, and hence of course the tradition of pedalling by toes alone. This method inevitably led to the writing of such conventional solo passages as those zigzag excursions up and down the scale that even Bach cannot always make interesting. This early pedal technique had a malign influence on composition; we may ascribe to it much of the poverty and lack of interest in the fugue subjects of the pre-Bach writers, especially Buxtehude, which were obviously designed with an eye to facile pedalling.

The development of Bach's own pedalling technique is reflected in his composition. We can almost date some of his works by the presence of zigzag scales, and such solo passages as this from the long three-section Fugue in C:

Ex. 8.



The basses in the Trio-Sonatas and in the later Chorale Preludes show that he must have developed an astonishing pedal technique of the modern heeling and sliding type. And there is still nothing in modern organ music more exacting than the double pedalling in the immense six-part Prelude on 'Aus tiefer Noth,' and in the various five-part pieces with two voices, played by the feet. And in a different way, the Preludes in which the chorale is given to the pedals with a high-pitched stop are also a severe test, especially of independence of L.H. and feet. One odd thing about Bach's writing for pedals is his rare use of octaves—so common a device by the Germans of a later period, especially Hesse and Rinck.

Mr. Ellingford alludes only briefly to the double-pedal in Bach, and cites the five-part 'Wir glauben all'.' He rightly says that such pieces show that Bach must have been aware of the value of taking skips—even large ones—by bridging over the gap with the toe and heel of one foot. In fact, I feel inclined to go even farther than Mr. Ellingford. My experience of playing the 'Aus tiefer Noth' and other double-pedal Preludes has convinced me that there is really very little need for crossing of feet. Greater certainty can be ensured by developing the technique of oblique footing, using the heel and toe as a bridge. The objection that a true legato is sometimes impossible by this means need not worry us. After all, we have to bear in mind the slowness with which the sound travels. From the hearer's point of view (which after all is the chief consideration), more pedalling is spoilt by the confused effect of too much legato than by too much mezzo-staccato. In fact, it is hardly an exaggeration to say that mezzo-staccato at the console is usually legato in the nave; whereas legato is mere confusion.

Pedal technique of the quick type has recently developed into a state of dazzling virtuosity (thanks largely to the organ-builder), but one has doubts about it from a musical point of view. (1) It is often too quick for clearness; (2) it is rarely phrased, and there is no time for phrasing details to come through even if they are present; (3) there is too little variety of touch, the legato being practically continuous. (What should we think of 'cello and double-bass parts that were sempre legato throughout a long work?)

Remedies? I believe almost every player (especially the brilliant pedallists) would gain much from eschewing for a time the showy delights of rapid foot-work in favour of a course of the Trio-Sonatas, the double pedal Chorale Preludes, and (perhaps above all) the Preludes in which the feet have to play a slow chorale melody on a 4-ft. stop. Add to these some pieces by Karg-Elert (Chorale Improvisation on 'Jesus, meine Zuversicht') and Vierne (Adagio from G minor Symphony, and 'Clair de Lune' in the Pièces de Fantaisie), in which the right foot plays a melody at the top and middle of the board while the left plays a detached bass at the bottom. As studies in phrasing and variety of touch (and in self-denial and modesty, for they don't sound difficult) these could hardly be beaten. After all, there is a lot more in 'playing on a gridiron' than old Sir George dreamt of!

Music in the Foreign Press

THE GREATNESS OF LISZT

In the January Musique, Vladimir Jankelevitch writes:

> 'Every day we are learning the better to realise Liszt's greatness and the greatness of the debt modern music owes him. Had Liszt not existed, there can be no doubt that music would have followed other roads, and perhaps lingered in the rut of "studied" forms (the French is "formes studieuses"). It is Liszt who has rendered possible Balakirev and Scriabin and Fauré and Debussy and Ravel. Apart from revolutionising the technique of pianoforte playing, he has considerably enriched the harmonic vocabulary, and thus prepared a revolution in harmony which others were to carry out. He was one of the first in modern times to use exotic modes and new scales. At a later period of his life, he studied Gregorian chant to good purpose, and realised the importance of Palestrina—thereby again showing prophetic insight.'

The remainder of the essay is devoted to considering the analogies and differences between Liszt's pianoforte music and that of various modern French composers. A further essay will deal with the works of Liszt's 'German' period (1847-61) and their influence.

MODERN TONALITY

In Le Ménestrel, January 11, A. Machabey writes:

> 'We are witnessing a conflict between the usual tonal—monotonal—system, which had reigned unchallenged among us for about four hundred years, and a number of other systems, atonal or polytonal, &c., which aim at extending or suppressing the boundaries fixed by European theory and practice.
> 'The basis of the old theory was the notion that harmony is predetermined by a natural law, with the consequence that "good" harmonies could be written even by a deaf man provided he was capable of applying the law. To palliate the strangeness of the conclusion that the human ear need not intervene, physiologists (among them Helmholtz) have attempted to demonstrate that the human ear is constituted in accordance with this law. But psychologists challenged this doctrine, and have succeeded by now in showing its fallacy.
> 'Nowadays, far subtler and more numerous relations between tones are perceived, owing to the active and necessary intervention of the sense of hearing, with which the intellect co-operates. The ear discovers the new relations, the intellect has to accept them or not.

Difficulties lie in the fact that whereas in the usual tonal music the tonic and dominant—i.e., the two "poles" around which all relationships centre—are very prominent, in the new music "poles" are hardly ever heard, if at all. Moreover, relationships follow no more or less uniform and predetermined order. Hence listeners are compelled to an active participation, instead of resting secure in their consciousness of a simple, almost automatic, procedure. They must keep a sharp look-out, call upon the latent possibilities of their sense of hearing and mind; they must constantly extend the range of their musical consciousness. It is chiefly in this respect that modern attempts are significant from the philosophical point of view: the new freedom and powers which the sense of hearing is stimulated to acquire mean far more than the introduction of new materials in musical art means in itself.'

EARLY ENGLISH MUSIC

In the December Musica Sacra (the quarterly published at Bruges), Dom Joseph Kreps emphasises the value of Dom Anselm Hughes's 'Worcester Mediæval Harmony of the 13th and 14th centuries':

'We had not a single foreign text to bridge the gap between "Sumer is icumen in" (1240) and the "Agincourt Song" (1415). The fragments of the Worcester manuscripts discovered in the bindings of various books and put together by Dom Anselm Hughes provide highly interesting specimens of the ars antiqua, i.e., of the music of the second period of polyphonic art. The texts include specimens of two-part, three-part, and four-part polyphony. The technique often reaches a high level; instances of double counterpoint occur—for instance, in Nos. 6 and 29, the latter a very beautiful "Alleluia." Another example of superb music is the Motet, No. 75. There is a certain relationship between these compositions and those of the French school of the same period.'

KURT WEILL contra WAGNER

In Das Orchester (January 15), Robert Hernried writes:

'The Berliner Tageblatt had asked a number of well-known artists how they would address an audience of school-children (age twelve or thereabouts) on the subject of their own life and works. The composer Kurt Weill availed himself of the opportunity to outline the following discourse:

'"I have just played to you music by Wagner and by his followers. You have seen that this music consists of so many notes, that I was unable to play them all. You would have liked now and then to join in singing the tune, but this proved impossible. You also noticed that the music made you feel sleepy, and drunk, as alcohol or an intoxicating drug might have done. You do not wish to go to sleep. You wish to hear music that can be understood without explanation. You probably wonder why your parents attend concerts. It is, with them, a mere matter of habit: nowadays, there are matters of greater interest to all; and if music cannot serve the interests of all, its existence is no longer justified. . . . Brecht and Weill have asked themselves what the function of music should be in stage-plays, and come to the conclusion that music should not co-operate in the action, but only interrupt it in suitable spots."'

ACOUSTICS AND HALLS

In the December Action Musicale (Brussels), Jules Brunfaut examines the question why so many theatre and concert halls are unsatisfactory as regards acoustics:

'In olden times, open-air theatres were constructed which proved entirely satisfactory. The trouble began in the 17th century, when the fashion of roofed theatres was started in Italy. Gradually architects forgot all about acoustics, and thought of halls merely in terms of suitable settings for gorgeously clad audiences. It has often been alleged (even quite lately) that it is impossible to establish any principle that will ensure satisfactory acoustics. Wagner proved the reverse by his planning of Bayreuth. And the acoustics of the Prinz Regent Theatre at Munich are likewise excellent. Only one improvement on the plan of these theatres is needed to achieve perfection—and this improvement is in accordance with the recommendations of Vitruvius: the floor of the auditorium should be, not an inclined plane, but an ascending curve (of the kind called 'chaînette' by French engineers), so as to allow each row of spectators to see over the heads of those in front of them, and to receive sound-waves directly. Investigations carried out by British experts, such as Roger Smith, Saunders, Scott Russell, G. A. Sutherland, and by others in Italy, in France, and in the United States, have determined many important points, among which two are capital: every curved surface distorts sound; a good hall should be rectangular.'

FATIGUE IN BOW INSTRUMENTS

In the Monde Musical (November-December), D. I. Chenantais explains how bow instruments are subject to fatigue, and when this occurs should be handled with strict care:

'Sometimes, in order to mellow a new instrument quickly, players use it to excess, and a period of aphony ensues. In this case a rest cure is beneficial. Very often it will serve the purpose better than the change of the bass-bar which short-sighted makers freely recommend. But with very ancient instruments the change of bass-bar often proves the only possible remedy to fatigue. Many proud owners of famous instruments are unwilling to acknowledge that even these have been thus treated.'

PIANOFORTE MUSIC FOR CHILDREN

The October Bolletino Bibliografico Musicale contains an article on this subject by Domenico de Paoli, and an attempt at cataloguing 'the keyboard music inspired by, or intended for, children.' The catalogue is extensive enough, but in many respects incomplete—especially with reference to contemporary British composers. It contains, besides the nomenclature, useful descriptive notes, and is worth preserving for reference. It might be used as a basis for a more thorough bibliography of this important subject.

HONEGGER'S POPULARITY

In the January Revue Musicale, Arthur Hoerée devotes an article to showing that 'of all composers of the younger generation who are by common consent acknowledged as men of genius, Arthur Honegger is the one who most truly commands the enthusiasm of the crowds.' He lays special stress on the triumphs of Honegger's music outside France.

NEW WORKS BY VILLA-LOBOS

In the same issue, Suzanne Demarquez considers a set of fourteen 'Chôros' by the Brazilian composer, Villa-Lobos :

'The name "Chôros" connotes a kind of musical composition, not dissimilar to the Serenade, in which the various modes of Brazilian and Indian music co-operate, and whose main elements are a characteristic rhythm and some tune or other in the character of a folk-tune. The fourteen examples under notice vary a good deal in scope and character. The first is for guitar solo, the second for flute and clarinet, others for various small instrumental combinations, and others for full orchestra or orchestra and choir. The orchestral settings comprise a number of native percussion instruments. The music is described as racy and impressive.'

DOMENICO ALALEONA

The January Musica d'Oggi contained an obituary of this composer and writer, who died on December 28, 1928, at the age of forty-seven. His 'Melodie pascoliane,' for voice and pianoforte, and his 'Canzoni Italiane,' for orchestra, are warmly praised, and his big book on Oratorio (1907) is described as an acknowledged classic.

ORCHESTRAL BALANCE

By Tom S. Wotton

(Concluded from February number, p. 118)

Wagner was a genius, and triumphed where lesser men would have failed. Still, even genius has its limitations. At times it is bound to stumble unless it be guided by the lamp of experience, and as regards 'The Ring' much of his experience counted for nothing. He was in the position of a painter working at a picture to be hung in an unknown light (the concealed orchestra), and using pigments that would probably dry a different colour. In some respects he was worse off than the deaf Beethoven, who at any rate was employing instruments he had known all his life.

Wagner was never wanting in audacity, and he certainly exhibited his courage when he sat down to score a work containing five instruments that existed only in his imagination. These were the bass trumpet, and the four so-called Wagner tubas.* He was not quite certain what he wanted, for at times a saxhorn tone seems demanded of the 'tubas,' at others that of a saxotromba. And whatever he wanted, he did not get, for when the five instruments came to be made, the original designs had to be modified. Another new instrument was the 'alto oboe,' which, he explains in 'Siegfried' and 'The Twilight of the Gods,' he had made (hat konstruiren lassen) to replace the cor anglais in the scores. Apparently he did not think the latter powerful enough to struggle against the three oboes—a confession of faulty balance ! * He also introduced five other instruments, which, if not novelties, had not been specified previously in a symphonic orchestra. Of these, the contrabass trombone, based on a model invented by Gottfried Weber early in the 19th century, was admittedly unsatisfactory. The same might be said of the three 'tenorbass' trombones, instruments of larger bore for the easier production of the lower register. The second and third were provided with the 'thumb piston' for (theoretically) bridging the interval between the E (the lowest note of the ordinary scale) and the B♭ below (the highest of the fundamental notes, usually called 'pedals'). In practice the B♮ is lacking, since it requires an impossible extension of the arm.† Wagner has the piston notes in the first three numbers of 'The Ring,' having in 'The Rhinegold' (Min. Sc., p. 225) the impossible B♯ (C♭), but, unless some passage has escaped me, they do not appear in the last section of the tetralogy. As he returns in 'Parsifal' to two (ordinary) tenor trombones with one bass one, it seems as though he were not altogether satisfied with the effect of practically three bass trombones. Balance again ! Finally, he requires his third bassoon to have a bottom joint enabling it to descend to low A, and directs that, should the instrument lack this note, the performer is to play it on a double-bassoon, a process which would often involve changing to the latter many bars previously, and retaining it long after the A had been sounded. Surely a happy-go-lucky style of orchestration ! What happens, when all three bassoons have the low A, as on p. 227 of 'The Rhinegold' (Min. Sc.), the deponent sayeth not.

Wagner, then, had the temerity to write for an orchestra, of which twelve or fourteen instruments were either unknown, untested, or aberrations from the normal, and all were intended to be played under novel conditions. Every great composer is, no doubt, something of a prophet, but as regards orchestration, he should deal with instruments as they exist, and not as he would have them. Beethoven probably dreamt of a land flowing with chromatic brass, where the strings and wood-wind triumphed over every difficulty, and always played in tune. But like a wise man he cut his coat according to his cloth, and by so doing often produced striking effects by reason of, instead of in spite of, the imperfections of his instruments. It is not necessarily a sign of genius to write for mythical instruments, or to give your violins and harps impossible passages.

On what Wagner based the number of his strings in 'The Ring,' I do not know. He may have thought that the epic nature of the drama demanded more brass instruments than had been previously employed in an operatic work, save

* A 'bass trumpet' had been employed previously in Austrian military bands, but this was not the instrument of which Wagner dreamt.

* Wagner seems to have cherished to the end of his life the idea of an alto oboe, since he marks it in 'Parsifal.' Whether it was actually made and employed, I have been unable to discover. For the performances of 'The Ring' at Bayreuth in 1896, four oboes and two cors anglais (instead of the three and one marked in the score) figure in the list of instruments given in Lavignac's 'Le Voyage artistique à Bayreuth.' Though possibly this means only five performers (one of them alternating between the oboe and cor anglais), it points to attempts to re-adjust the oboe quartet. Except for absolutely solo work, perhaps a heckelphone would best meet the Master's wishes.

† The 'tenorbass' trombone is really a bass one in F cut down to the length of a B♭ tenor, the piston for the thumb controlling an additional piece of tubing, which throws the instrument back again to its original bass form. To obtain the low C, the slide, unprovided with the handle with which the ordinary bass trombone is equipped, has to be extended as far as it would be for the low E on a tenor. To reach the B♮ the performer would require the arm of a gorilla.

on the stage in his own 'Rienzi' and in the scores of Meyerbeer and others at the Grand Opera. Or in spite of what has been said above, he may have believed that the concealing of the orchestra would damp the brass more than the strings. But be that as it may, the fact remains that in marking only sixty-four of the latter against thirty-two wind instruments, seventeen of which were brass, he displaced the hitherto accepted centre of gravity of the orchestra, which depends mainly on the ratio between the brass and the strings. Now, Beethoven looked upon an orchestra of from fifty to sixty as the ideal one for the performance of his works, and, taking the higher figure as representing his preference, this gives us forty-five strings against fifteen wind—eight wood and seven brass (three trombones and a pair each of horns and trumpets). That is, the strings were three times the number of the whole wind band, and more than six times the number of the brass. Calculating from the latter figures, this would mean for 'The Ring' a hundred and two strings, which is the proportion Berlioz has in his 'Te Deum'—a hundred and one strings against thirty-two wind (sixteen wood plus sixteen brass). And Berlioz was certainly a master of balance. With the exception of the 'Symphonie funèbre' and the 'Requiem'* he specified the same balance, or practically so, in all his other works. His ideal orchestra, given in his treatise, has eighty-four strings against twenty-seven wind (fourteen wood plus thirteen brass). For pre-'Ring' days we may regard the Beethoven-Berlioz balance as being, with trifling variations, generally accepted.

Of the result of Wagner's example there is no doubt, although, as it has come about gradually, we have not perhaps fully realised it. Here are the dispositions of some post-Wagnerian orchestras: 'Le Divin Poème' (Scriabin), sixty-four strings and thirty-three wind (sixteen wood plus seventeen brass); 'Salome,' sixty to sixty-two strings† and thirty-five wind (eighteen wood plus seventeen brass); 'Electra,' sixty-two strings and forty wind (twenty wood plus twenty brass); and, for 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' Stravinsky marks thirty-eight wind (twenty wood plus eighteen brass), but has no figures for the strings, though, from the score, he apparently wants twelve violas and sixteen first-violins, which means in all probability that he anticipated the Wagnerian sixty-four for the entire body, a mystic number which has become a fetish for certain composers, quite regardless of whether their figures for the wood-wind and brass agree with those of their predecessor.

As opposed to the above we may turn to Rimsky-Korsakov, who comes in a different category. Not only has his orchestration more affinity with that of Berlioz and Liszt than with Wagner's, but he seems to have studied the nice question of balance more scientifically than any other composer. For 'The Golden Cockerel' he marks sixty strings, with a possible minimum of forty, against eleven brass and twelve wood-wind. That is, he wanted the seventy-five per cent. of Beethoven and Berlioz, but at a pinch would resign himself to the two-thirds string power of Wagner. It is true that in 'Mlada' he has sixty-four strings against twenty-seven wind—verging on 'The Ring' balance, but then has marked only thirteen brass. For Wagner's seventeen he should have logically specified eighty-four strings, agreeing both with his own 'Golden Cockerel' and Berlioz's ideal orchestra. The modern French composers, while careful to enumerate their wind, omit any figures for the strings, and yet at times indulge in subdivisions of the latter, where their calculated number for each part seems of importance. This is specially true of Debussy.

In practice unhappily this shifting of the centre of gravity of the orchestra becomes still more pronounced. In a work when every fiddler ought to count, when even Strauss's two extra violas may affect the harmonic balance, the sordid question of expense intrudes, and the strings are less—sometimes much less—than even the composer's (proportionately) modest estimate. Giving him the benefit of the doubt, he may prefer the ratio of Beethoven; but, as this would connote an orchestra of a hundred and fifty or thereabouts, practical considerations forbid it. His choice then lying between strings and wind, the lure of the latter proves irresistible. Only the most unkind critic would suggest that this decision is not unconnected with a desire to create novel effects with a minimum of trouble. It is not difficult to make new noises with new instruments, or new groupings of the old ones, when the opportunity of judging whether they are nice new noises, perfectly balanced, is artfully avoided by changing the tone-colour every half-bar.

No music-lover would have orchestration to stand still. Probably the classic orchestra has been squeezed dry, so far as fresh combinations are concerned, though it still requires the genius to form the perfect equation betwixt phrase and instrument. The modern treatment of the strings, with subdivisions, harmonics, pizzicatos, and glissandos,* has not left many fresh worlds to conquer.* Although, for their experiments in the region of the brass, modern composers usually confine themselves to doubling or trebling the regulation horns, trumpets, and trombones, some of the instruments of the brass band might offer that variety for which they crave. On the whole the wood-wind family presents the most fruitful field for exploration. From our present point of view the principal objection to this is that a good balance is more difficult to obtain with the flutes and reed-instruments. The strings, from the lowest note of the double-basses to the highest of the fiddles, give us a practically homogeneous scale, and it is this, combined with the fact that the ear is not so quickly satiated with their tone as with that of the brass and wood-wind, that so fits them to be the backbone of the orchestra. We have an almost similar homogeneity of tone in the combined scale of the brass instruments. But though in some modern works we may have a military band, with a few strings thrown in 'for old sake's sake,' we have not yet arrived at the brass band stage. Still, who knows?

* The first, with its eighty strings against ninety-seven wind instruments is a work for military band, with the strings marked ad libitum: and the four brass orchestras in the second were employed for a special effect, and combined with the strings for only about eighty bars out of fourteen hundred.

† This difference of two between the composer's demands and a possible minimum, is amusing. The violas may be ten or twelve. Probably a sarcastic comment of Strauss's on the conduct of those who would seek to perform the work with inadequate means.

* There may be still possibilities in mutes on the fourth string, pizzicato for the left hand, and the 'coffee-cup' resonator used in Mascagni's 'Iris.'

There is no particular moral in all this. That balance is an integral part of orchestration cannot be disputed. That we never get it, is an exaggeration. But from economic and other reasons we hear it so seldom that it is next to impossible to preserve a standard pattern in our minds. And things are complicated by there being two standards, the one required by Beethoven, Berlioz, and Weber, and the other chosen (for whatever reason) by Wagner, Stravinsky, and Strauss. Though one may cherish a pious wish that orchestras confined themselves to works within their means, nothing is gained by hurling indiscriminate denunciations. The public pays the piper, and can call the orchestration. If it be content with garbled versions, who has the right to object? Let us avoid, however, the dragging in of unctuous phrases of the 'educating the masses' type. The distorted reproduction of a masterpiece may give pleasure to uncritical minds, but it never educated anybody. Occasionally inquisitive souls may seek the original, curious to learn whether the imitation is really as bad as it appears to be. The masses remain quite happy, wallowing in the trough of imperfection.

Composers have been blamed for the present state of affairs, but perhaps unjustly. They may all agree with Sir Alexander Mackenzie in his 'Musician's Narrative,' and 'prefer to have their works performed sometimes on two horns, rather than never on four.' Yet would more modest demands really make much difference? If they write for a hundred musicians, the piece will be played by sixty-five; and if they carefully plan their balance for the latter number, it will be mutilated by twenty-five or thirty.

NON-MUSICAL FACTORS IN THE APPRECIATION OF MUSIC

By P. E. Vernon

Now though the abstract type of listeners combine in condemning the representational effects of music, yet too much technical interest may be equally distracting from full appreciation. Thinking about the cleverness of the composer, or of oneself for elucidating his cleverness, may easily become an end in itself, presumably gratifying some self-assertive or constructive instinct; but such pleasure is hardly æsthetic. Yet the attitude is to a large extent inevitable, even when (as in the second experimental concert) an attempt is made to eliminate it by dispensing with programmes, in the hope that the music may be appreciated solely for itself. Although the audience were particularly requested not to regard the concert as a guessing competition, all but the most unmusical 12 per cent. speculated as to the composers, their period, the performers, &c., in most of the items; the more musical half got about two-fifths of their guesses right, the less musical about one-quarter. The latter made fewer technical allusions, but criticised the performers more than the musical. The first item was a violin suite consisting of four movements, none of them originally written for the violin, by Purcell, Berlioz (Fugue on Brander's song from 'Faust'), Rameau, and Mozart. Only about the most musical twenty per cent. noticed any heterogeneity of styles, and not more than a third of these suspected it to be a hoax. Incidentally this shows that the supposed necessity for coherence and continuity in a sonata or suite, and the objection to music being transcribed, have little weight for the great majority of listeners. In another item, a Purcell 'Ground in Gamut,' only 16 per cent. (again the most musical) noticed the ground bass; most of the rest, not knowing what it was about, were rather bored. Finally an original improvisation in the modern style was played, introducing the tune of 'God save the King'; only one person noticed this theme, two guessed that it was an improvisation, while most of the others ascribed it to some such composer as Debussy, Stravinsky, Scriabin, or Goossens.

It appears, therefore, that abnormal conditions merely distort technical interest and make it more prominent; they are, in fact, most unsound. We inevitably interpret what we hear in the light of our past musical or non-musical experience; we build up special knowledge and means of perception so as to put ourselves into the appropriate period and style of the composer or of the title of the piece. We try to appreciate Beethoven's music not as a poor edition of Bach's, nor a Funeral March as a Gigue, but each for its own qualities. Completely abstract (that is, purely auditory) music is unattainable; and as music was primarily connected with words or other non-musical meaning, so-called absolute music being a later specialisation, the representational attitude is almost equally unavoidable. Most musicians attach some significance to words such as allegro and scherzo, or even more suggestive ones such as agitato, maestoso, and perdendosi, so that they have no right to condemn fancy titles, analytic programmes, and the like; all help in the comprehension of the composer's intention. Nor is music generally of itself abstract or programme, but is largely what different listeners make of it. One person on hearing, say, a Handel Gigue may visualise people dancing round a maypole; another will concentrate solely on the composer's technical devices. All that one can safely assert is that, among musicians with most experience, on the one hand the emotions tend to be controlled, integrated, and to lose their concrete reference, and on the other hand technical interests tend to be regarded as means to an end, to be used for getting the most out of music; but that, for fullest appreciation, they should become largely automatic and subconscious.

We must now return to visualisation. In certain cases it assumes more musical forms. For instance, at the second concert many of the audience mentally saw the performers behind the screen; naturally this must be an almost constant element among a large number of people who listen in to broadcast music. The innumerable portraits in the Radio Times probably help in this process, and increase the so-called human element. Visual or other non-auditory means are also used in the actual perception and recall of music by most of the ordinary listeners, and even by about 10 per cent. or more trained musicians. Some visualise the notes that are being played on the score or on the instruments, or else their names, or the name of the key; others respond to music not in terms of sound but by a subconscious tendency to hum it. Many also hear or think of music muscularly. They raise their heads or contract some other muscle when the music rises, or they perceive it in terms of their hands at the pianoforte or other instruments. Thus several of my audience noticed that their fingers tried to follow those of the pianists, others felt that they wanted to dance, especially in strongly rhythmic music. In slow movements any audience obviously sinks down with relaxed muscles; but it seems that, for most people, full perception of music requires that the body should be in good muscular tone and well braced; standards of taste are often lowered when one is reclining in a comfortable chair; possibly this is partly responsible for the high level of the tastes of a Promenade concert audience, many of whom have to stand up and are correspondingly capable of appreciating 'strong' music. Rhythm is an aspect of music that is more of a bodily than an auditory nature; over three-quarters of my audience acknowledged making considerable or moderate bodily responses to it, though often only feeling tendencies to move their legs, hands, &c., rather than actually swaying them to and fro. Again, the more musical seem to respond less overtly, more mentally or implicitly. We see, therefore, that much that is non-auditory may be quite efficient and helpful in appreciation, and far from being non-musical.

A phenomenon rather similar to visualisation of scenes is 'coloured hearing,' or synæsthesia; out of about a hundred people with whom I dealt there were half a dozen genuine cases. As an example, one man, when he hears the chord of A major sees the colour green and then remembers that green is A, so that he has absolute pitch through colour. For him the colours are essentially tonal, so that those corresponding to related keys are similar. They are only seen when a piece is characteristically in one key; in this case the notes of the music were seen mentally superimposed on a background of the prevailing key colour. Many other people have associations: for example, the trumpet reminding them of scarlet, the flute of blue, &c.; but real synæsthetic colours seem to be inextricably bound up with the actual perception and recollection of the notes. Synæsthetic persons always regard their colours as quite natural, and, until they inquire into the matter, imagine that everyone is like themselves in this respect, while actually no two synæsthetics are likely to agree in their colour schemes. Scriabin was a synæsthetic who very strongly associated odours as well as colours with music.

About half a dozen more subjects saw moving or stationary patterns when listening to music; such phenomena may appear ridiculous or incredible, yet of musicians with absolute pitch (say 30 to 40 per cent.) the majority often have precisely analogous associations of keys, not with colours but with various emotional characteristics. They often state, for example, that the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger' could be in no other key but C major, and that E major is typical of such music as Mendelssohn so often wrote, and, as a corollary, that the Overture to 'Tannhäuser' is weakened by being largely written in E. Naturally such opinions may seem quite illogical to those who do not generalise in this way, which presumably results from associating this key, so often used by Mendelssohn, with one's emotional attitude towards him and his works, and then projecting this attitude, often unconsciously, on to the works of other composers in the same key. But again, even those without absolute pitch may associate specific chords or progressions with the style of, say, Vaughan Williams, or Franck, so that in general these are not, I think, non-musical phenomena. There is no essential difference between coloured hearing, seeing patterns, giving keys special characteristics, and mere generalisations about the style of well-known composers. Like the translation of heard music into terms of sight or muscles, they are merely modes of thinking, analogous to different languages; they are found at all musical levels, and there is no reason why everyone should not have individual peculiarities of this type without finding them to be irrelevant or distracting from the highest appreciation.

(To be concluded.)

THE 'SAINT JOHN' PASSION

A New Edition

Although of late years the great merits of Bach's 'St. John' Passion have been increasingly recognised, it is still overshadowed by its more mature companion. In all music there is no parallel example of two such great works on one subject by the same composer, and it is to some extent inevitable that the riper of the pair should throw its fellow into comparative shade. The case was well put by G. A. Macfarren in his Preface to the Troutbeck edition of the 'St. John' Passion. 'If there were no "Matthew" Passion,' he said, 'the "St. John" would be esteemed above all price a masterpiece.'

The new edition of the 'St. John' Passion, to be issued by Messrs. Novello on March 12, will probably bring about an increased number of performances, for reasons that will be made clear below. The editor is Sir Ivor Atkins, whose name is a guarantee both of scholarship and practicability.

The first aim of this new version is that of the edition of the 'St. Matthew' Passion made by Sir Edward Elgar and Sir Ivor Atkins a few years ago, namely, the retention in the narrative (recitative) of the words of the Authorised Version, and the reproduction of Bach's declamation so far as the English words allow. This is a reversal of the practice of earlier editors, whose first care was a scrupulous respect for the music, though they were not blind to the importance of using the Authorised Version so far as fidelity to Bach's notation allowed. Thus Macfarren, rightly praising Troutbeck's translation, says 'He has been singularly fortunate in the preservation of nearly all the words of the accepted version of the Scripture text, for the narrative would lose much of its hold on our interest were it represented in other than the familiar syllables.' In this new edition the Revised Version has been drawn on in a few instances where the use of the Authorised was impracticable; and, more rarely, the editor has made use of some of the older versions given in 'The English Hexapla.'

The extent to which it has been necessary to modify Bach's notation, and the improvements that result, may be seen by an example taken almost at random. We give a brief extract from one of the recitatives, with the corresponding passage from the Troutbeck version for the sake of comparison :

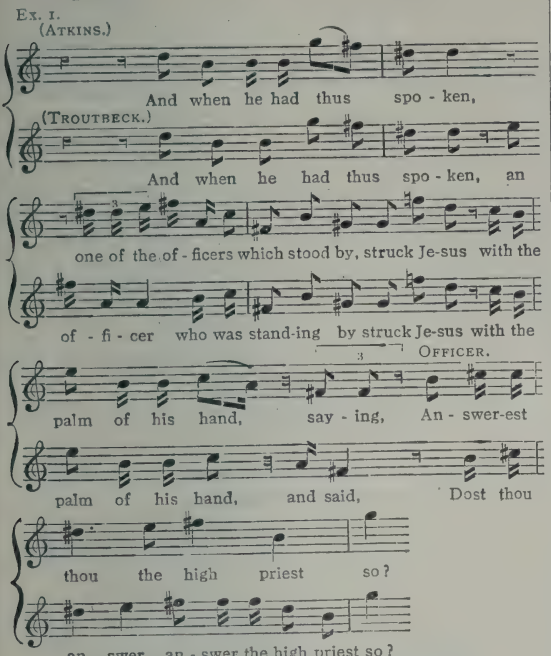
Ex. 1.



(ATKINS.)
And when he had thus spo - ken,
(TROUTBECK.)
And when he had thus spo - ken, an one of the of - ficers which stood by, struck Je-sus with the of - fi - cer who was stand-ing by struck Je-sus with the OFFICER.
palm of his hand, say - ing, An - swer-est palm of his hand, and said, Dost thou thou the high priest so?
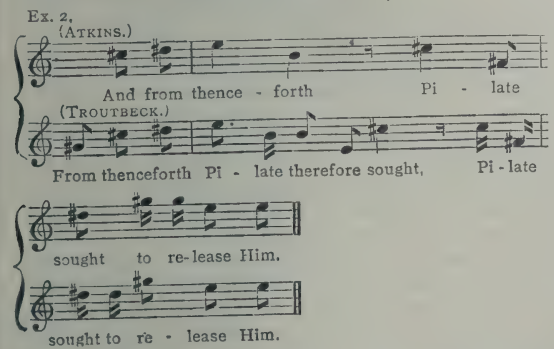
an - swer, an - swer the high priest so?

Good as the older version is, there can be little doubt as to the superiority of the new.

Repetition of words is never less desirable than in recitative. The example above shows how the Atkins edition avoids a slight repetition. Here is another more striking example :

Ex. 2.



(ATKINS.)
And from thence - forth Pi - late
(TROUTBECK.)
From thenceforth Pi - late therefore sought, Pi - late sought to re-lease Him.
sought to re - lease Him.

Choirs have now a choice. Those who prefer Bach's exact notation may continue to use Troutbeck : for those who want the Bible text (together with an improved lay-out and many other conveniences), here is Atkins.

A new translation of the texts of the arias and chorales has been written by Dr. T. A. Lacey, whose admirable work in this field has long been known to users of the 'English Hymnal' and other collections.

The editor has (rightly, we think) been sparing in his use of expression marks. None are given for the chorales. Sir Ivor points out in the Preface that the expression in these numbers should be simple, and should result naturally from the preceding scene. Bach intended the chorales to be accompanied by orchestra and organ, and Sir Ivor holds there is no justification for a departure from that method. Bach's few indications of pace—they occur in only six numbers—are printed in italic; the editor's indications are in roman. Distinction is also made between the original and the editorial expression marks, the latter being enclosed in brackets.

In the matter of phrasing Sir Ivor has restored Bach's indications in accordance with the Bach-Gesellschaft full score. Where Bach left the phrasing incomplete, his intentions are generally to be discovered from a study of parallel passages in the same number.

The pianoforte reduction is based on that of the earlier Novello edition, but it has been carefully revised. There has been some clarification, too, especially in the opening chorus. The figured bass workings have also been overhauled, and in some cases newly written. A useful and interesting addition is the indication throughout of the scoring. These markings will be of special service in performances where organ accompaniment only is available. By the aid of these clear and ample markings, a good player on an adequate organ can produce a very good substitute for Bach's orchestration.

The use of titles for the various episodes is helpful, and it was a happy idea to amplify the numbering in accordance with that of the Peters edition of the full score. The advantage at rehearsals need no emphasis. Thus, in the earlier edition, No. 7 consists of the aria, 'I follow thee also,' and several pages of recitative. In all such cases, a fresh number is used for the recitative. The numberings now total sixty-eight, against thirty-seven in the former edition.

Lastly, as a practical point that will appeal to chorus singers, we mention the clear spacing and laying out of the text and music. In a word, it is evident that, from start to finish, the utmost pains have been taken to present this masterpiece worthily.

Occasional Notes

The Selection Board entrusted by the University of Glasgow and the Scottish National Academy of Music with the responsibility of nominating a first occupant for the new dual post of 'Gardiner' Professor of Music at Glasgow University and Principal or Director of the Scottish National Academy of Music, announces that it will shortly take steps towards an appointment, and has issued a schedule of the conditions attaching thereto, copies of which may be had on application to the Secretary of the University Court or the Secretary of the Scottish National Academy of Music. The person appointed is required to give his whole time to the duties of the post, and is specifically precluded from private teaching, but may accept other professional engagements with consent. The duties are defined as :

> 'The promotion of the study of music in the University and the furtherance of musical study and proficiency among the teachers and students of the Scottish National Academy of Music and the advancement of musical education and appreciation in Scotland in terms of a joint Agreement to be made from time to time between the University Court and the Governors of the Scottish National Academy of Music.'

The salary will not be less than £1,300 per annum. The appointment appears to be a desirable one, offering attractive opportunities, and should command wide interest.

We have on several occasions pointed out the damage done to local musical activities by the touring 'star' who at a single concert absorbs most of the money available in the district for expenditure on music. It is not the fault of the 'star,' of course. He cannot be blamed for making all the hay possible while the sun shines. The blame lies with the folk who provide the hay without giving a thought to the needs of musical organizations in their own town. After all, these minister to the musical needs of the district throughout the season, whereas the 'star' merely flashes across the local welkin once in a year. Mr. James Glover has a paragraph on the subject in a recent number of The Stage. After giving particulars of a recital at a seaside town where Kreisler played for a minimum fee of £300 and the local management lost money, Mr. Glover goes on :

> 'Now what is the result? £300 is taken away in two hours out of a small seaside town by a foreign artist. The hall is provided by the ratepayers at a small rental, and thus local musical interest for a period is starved of a big sum of money, and all to what purpose? What do we find the very next day? A ratepayer writing to the local journal to know why the municipal orchestra, at a cost of £250 a week and its excellent conductor, are not better patronised. Why? The celebrity matinée scooped the pool. This is not good finance, but it is part and parcel of our music commerce. £300 spent on three hundred pound season tickets for the municipal orchestra would save it from loss; and the money would be kept in the town and distributed therein.'

This little lesson in musical economics needs to be rubbed in up and down the country.

The Dayton Choir from the United States will make its first appearance in England on April 7, at the Albert Hall. (The choir's full title is 'Dayton Westminster Choir,' but the 'Westminster' will be dropped during its English tour in order to avoid confusion.) The coming of this body of singers should rouse great interest in British choral circles. The prospectus tells us that 'their whole scheme of preparation has been along the lines of English choral singing, which is accepted as the basis of our national life and America's surest model.' These are pleasant words, which will be appreciated on this side. But we are disappointed to notice that the programme contains not a single English work. A cappella music is a department in which England can surely look the whole world in the face!

The Geneva Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music will be held from April 6 to April 10—an earlier date than that provisionally given when the programmes were announced. John Ireland will play his Sonatina, and Raymond Jeremy will be the soloist in Vaughan Williams's 'Flos Campi.' These works are in the fourth and third programmes respectively.

We are requested to announce that the date for sending in entries for the competition organized by the Amsterdam Society for the Promotion of Music has been changed from March 1 to April 1.

The Bach Cantata Club's third year has proved to be by far its most successful. The amount of public support is of the solid type that enabled the Club to give five subscription concerts and one extra concert. The programmes for the fourth season are of great interest, and will include a special bi-centenary performance of the 'St. Matthew' Passion.

We are asked to point out that the report in the daily press of the liquidation of the Grand Opera Syndicate, Ltd., refers to the original company, and not (as many people supposed) to the Covent Garden Opera Syndicate, Ltd. The latter body is very much alive, and will launch a ten weeks' season of grand opera on April 22.

Dr. W. H. Harris has been appointed organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, in succession to the late Noel Ponsonby.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'The Mechanics of Singing.' By Edgar T. Evetts and Robert A. Worthington, O.B.E., M.B., F.R.C.S.

[Dent, 6*s*.]

'A Selection of Solfeggios.' By Vittorio Ricci.

[Joseph Williams: mostly 5*s*. and 6*s*. per volume.]

In 'The Mechanics of Singing' the authors—a teacher of singing and a laryngologist respectively—have something fresh to say on the vexed question of registers. They are of opinion that 'the tradition of voice-production and the modern methods of teaching singing are wrong.' Referring to the attempts that have been made since Garcia's invention of the laryngeal mirror to place the art of voice-production upon a more scientific basis, they remark that 'the result so far has been a failure from a practical point of view, for the observations made upon the larynx by reflected light tell only part of the story, and alone do not account for the difficulties of singers. Yet in order to explain those difficulties, a theory of multiple registers has been evolved for the existence of which there is little or no evidence to be obtained with the laryngoscope. . . . So far has the current of physiological teaching misled both the student and teacher that marks are to-day awarded in the examinations for diplomas in singing for the blending of non-existent registers.'

The solution of the problem, according to the authors, is entirely a matter of correct adjustment of the resonating apparatus, the position of the soft palate being the vital factor. 'The break in continuity of vocal quality is not a normal and unavoidable characteristic of the human voice which it is the object of training merely to disguise. On the contrary, it is entirely due to faulty positions of the resonator. . . . In so far as it is accepted that the term "register" refers to a particular laryngeal mechanism, the so-called "middle" and

"head" registers are not registers at all, but merely different tone-qualities due to different positions of the resonator.' Three reproductions of radiographs or X-ray photographs are given, showing the position of the resonating cavity, &c., in normal tone, open tone, and unduly nasal tone. The use in singing of the mechanism of the 'thick' cords (chest register) by women and of the 'thin' cords (falsetto) by men is condemned. The writers claim that by their method the voice of each sex can be produced throughout the entire compass in even quality and volume by its own proper mechanism only, namely, thick in the male, thin in the female. 'In singing with the natural voice proper to the sex, differences of register at different points in the compass do not occur, and therefore no question of the blending of the registers should ever arise.'

Apart from controversial matter, the book contains much that may be profitably read by the student. There is an excellent chapter on the larynx, illustrated by numerous diagrams. Breathing is discussed under 'The Respiratory Mechanism'—clearly and concisely described—and 'Respiration in Singing and Speaking.' In this latter section the authors develop arguments in support of their view that easy, natural breathing during singing 'depends essentially on a singer making a free use of supplemental air, and avoiding the conscious anticipatory use of complemental air.' Thus, one of the rules for breathing runs: 'The depth of an inspiration when singing is to be solely determined by the need for oxygen at the moment, and by no other consideration.' Hence follows the injunction—at variance with that usually given—never to take a deep inspiration immediately before beginning to sing; any additional breath 'required for singing long phrases over what is provided by the tidal movement of the chest wall is to be obtained by the use of the supplemental air, rather than by taking in anticipation a deeper breath than the need of oxygen demands.' It may be interesting to recall Lamperti's view—quoted by W. Shakespeare in 'The Art of Singing'—that 'all our singing should be done on a breath-supply of between twenty seconds or more and five seconds, and we should always have this latter quantity in reserve at the close of the phrase. The moment an attempt is made to sing with the end of the breath, the impossibility of rightly controlling it is felt by the singer, and also by the listener, who detects the absence of steadiness and the lack of fullness in the tone and intensity of the note.'

The last chapter, 'Principles applied to Practice,' includes, amongst other things, examples of breathing exercises, progressive voice exercises, and brief notes on resonation, the training of adolescents, and tone-colour.

The selection of Solfeggios issued by Joseph Williams contains examples by the most celebrated Italian composers and singing masters of the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries, edited and arranged mostly from manuscripts, with additional pianoforte accompaniment by V. Ricci. They are published in a number of substantial volumes, including some for two and three voices and one for beginners. The character and scope of the various books may be seen in a collection of specimen pages, with index of composers, which may be obtained from the publishers. G. G.

'Musical Instruments and their Music, 1500-1750.' By Gerald R. Hayes.

[Oxford University Press, 4*s.* 6*d.*]

This is the first of a projected series of five books. Its sub-title is 'The Treatment of Instrumental Music,' and its main object is 'to state and defend certain fundamental principles' in regard to the present-day performance of old music. 'It is becoming increasingly evident that a definite line of cleavage exists among musicians upon these principles; there is no possibility of compromise, and the whole question must be fought to a clear issue.' Mr. Hayes is all for the pure milk of the word; old music must be performed on the instruments for which it was written. In theory this is right; but in practice it means that we must forego not only the lesser and earlier writers, but practically all Bach, until we are well supplied with harpsichords, clavecins, viole da gamba, lutes, oboi di caccia, recorders, and all other obsolete instruments of musick. Even Bach's organ works would have to be shelved, for it is certain that the organs of his day and ours vary at least as much as do the harpsichord and pianoforte. Moreover, it may be argued that, delightful as some of the old instruments are, their successors are even better. Certainly their greater sonority makes them fitter for present-day performing conditions, when music has moved from the domestic circle to the concert hall.

How far the purist will go is shown by the following instance. After mentioning the 'mutilation' of Bach's sixth Brandenburg Concerto by playing it with three violoncellos instead of with two viole da gamba and one 'cello, Mr. Hayes goes on:

> 'A similar case of later date is found in Haydn's Divertimento in B flat for oboe, violin, viola da gamba, violoncello, and harpsichord. Here, again, there is the perfectly definite distinction between the violoncello and the viola da gamba; but happily this important and charming work has not been publicly distorted, as the only extant copy is a contemporary manuscript in private hands.'

But is it not better that an 'important and charming' work of Haydn's should be heard with some departure from the original colour-scheme than not heard at all? (The word 'distortion' is too strong, as it applies to texture rather than to media.) If we had a Ministry of Fine Arts, one of its functions should be to see that no 'private hands' were allowed to prevent publication and performance of music that belongs to the world; the rights of property in a Haydn work should stop at the MS. Mr. Hayes compares modern performance on substituted instruments to the re-writing of Shakespeare by Restoration dramatists. The analogy is false, for there is a world of difference between re-writing a text and slightly changing the medium of performance, especially when the change is a matter not of choice but of necessity. A better parallel would be the performance of Shakespeare to-day with modern pronunciation, which differs from that of Shakespeare's day as much as the tone-colour of a 'cello differs from that of a viola da gamba. So, if Mr. Hayes wishes to pursue his literary analogy to its logical end, we must perform no more Shakespeare until we have revived the spelling and pronunciation of the Elizabethans.

No, it won't do. We wish Mr. Hayes and Mr. Dolmetsch more power to their elbows in the revival of old instruments, but we refuse to accept their view that performance of the music must await the completion of that revival. ('Completion' means the manufacture and marketing of old instruments on such a scale as to make them easily accessible to all public performers and to private players of moderate means.) Until that day, we shall continue to enjoy our Byrd, Farnaby, Gibbons, Bach, &c., on a pianoforte, and to make use of any transcription that shall enable us to become acquainted with as much old music as comes our way. Music is dead until it is heard; and half a life is better than no breath.

Happily, Mr. Hayes's book does not depend for its value on his main argument. It contains a wealth of information, and is so well written that a good deal of toughish material is easily and enjoyably taken in by the ordinary reader.

'The Poets and Music.' By E. W. Naylor.

[Dent, 6*s*.]

Dr. Naylor is in his element here. The subject is a good one. Poets, like novelists and literary folk in general, have often put their foot in it when handling music. We should think far less than we do of this book if the author had been content to show up the 'howlers.' That is easy game. Happily, he has done much more, and by his astute commentary on the musical references in Coleridge, Milton, Herbert, Traherne, Herrick, Spenser, Skelton, Chaucer, and, of course, Shakespeare, &c., he makes many rough places plain, and also adds to the pleasure of such musicians as read poetry. (Too few do. Musicians ought to be the poets' best customers. Are they too busy? Or too matter-of-fact? Whatever the cause, a musician who has no use for poetry, save as a vehicle for musical setting and royalty-earning, is putting his imagination on short rations.) Browning has a chapter to himself, as is fitting. Dr. Naylor works out in music the closing lines of 'Abt Vogler.' He does so with diffidence, and feels that the verse is unworthy of the rest of the poem. This is, perhaps, right, for Browning attempted the impossible. A musical progression expressed verbally must either be technical and unpoctical, or so vague as to be almost pointless. Dr. Naylor rightly says that in the familiar lines about the musician framing from three sounds 'not a fourth sound, but a star,' Browning 'seems to have touched upon the foundation-stone of musical æsthetics.' Four pages are given to a discussion of this. As Dr. Naylor says, Browning might have reduced the number of sounds from three to two, and so increased the miracle. There is solid learning in the work (especially concerning resultant tones), and much antiquarian lore of many kinds. For the literary man with a bias towards music, and for the musician with literary leanings, this book is a delight. And although it is natural to speak of poets' musical slips, Dr. Naylor's study leaves them on the whole with a balance on the right side. For what do a dozen howlers weigh against one of the many penetrating and profound utterances of the poets about music? Let the musician who thinks more about the 'howlers' than about the profundities ask himself if, after all, he knows as much about poetry as the sometimes erring poet knows about music.

'Principes rationnels de la technique pianistique.' By Alfred Cortot.

[Paris: Senart, 50 francs.]

Many years ago a pianist told me that his teacher (a very famous one) had said, 'If composers continue to use the whole-tone scale, I shall have to write a book of exercises in that scale.' The outlook which this sentence denotes is now obsolete, fortunately; but I doubt if anyone has gone so far in the opposite direction as Alfred Cortot.

The object of this book is to reduce all difficulties to bed-rock—i.e., to a small number of elementary categories—and the exercises to the simplest and most generally useful movements, 'so that in one hour a day the student will be able to review the whole cycle of the problems that occur in piano-playing.' The exercises fall into five groups, dealing with evenness, independence, and mobility of the fingers; passing the thumb (the exercises in this section are particularly ingenious); playing double notes, from seconds to octaves, and notes in various parallel or polyphonic combinations; extension; and the technique of the wrist.

At the end of the book there is a fairly extensive repertory of keyboard music, ancient and modern, recommended for study. And with every item the grade of difficulty in respect of each of the above five basic categories is given. In short, a splendid contribution. M.-D. C.

'A Miniature History of Music, for the General Reader and the Student.' By Percy Scholes.

[Oxford University Press, 1*s*. 6*d*. cloth; 1*s*. paper.]

If we hadn't seen this book, we should have been sceptical as to the possibility of writing a history of music in seven short chapters and about fifteen thousand words. But Mr. Scholes proves that it can be done, and done in such a way that even the hardened reviewer arrives at its fifteen-thousandth word with a mental picture that he is glad to have acquired. Especially good are the discussions of 'Music as Romance,' with a glance at the influence of the literary romantics, and the chapter on 'Impressionism in Music,' wherein the literary and pictorial bases of an important school of modern composers is very clearly and simply discussed. Mr. Scholes has to his credit a good many feats in the popular educational line; this multum in parvo is both the smallest and one of the biggest.

'Cecil Sharp and English Folk-Dances.' By Winifred Shuldham-Shaw.

[English Folk-Dance Society, 107, Great Russell Street, W.C. 1, 1*s*.]

Here is a charming little book that should be possessed by all who gratefully remember Cecil Sharp and his life-work, and who wish to see that work placed on a permanent basis.

To the brief biography is added a good deal of other matter—stories about song-collecting, information about folk-songs and dances, an account of the E.F.D.S., a plan of the Cecil Sharp Memorial building, and many illustrations of singers and dancers. Mrs. Shuldham-Shaw writes attractively, and the little work is most tastefully produced. The proceeds from its sale are given to the Memorial Fund.

'Histoire et Evolution des Formules Musicales du 1er au 15ème siècles de l'Ere Chrétienne.' By A. Machabey.

[Paris: Payot, 25 francs.]

This very scholarly book is devoted to the history of the development of the main formulæ upon the use of which modern European music is founded, viz., the major and minor scales and the full close. The author starts by considering the contribution of the early Middle Ages (2nd to 8th centuries), and ends with the period at which the full close is not only in common use, but codified in theoretical treatises—the end of the 15th century. His main thesis, for which he makes a convincing case, is that the Paris school of the 13th century, and the French and Dutch masters of the following two centuries, played the leading part in establishing all three formulæ, no documents having yet appeared to show that English or Italian composers were at any moment first in the field. There is a good bibliography, but, unfortunately, no index. M.-D. C.

'Purcell.' By Henri Dupré. Translated from the French by Catherine Alison Phillips and Agnes Bedford.

[Knopf, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

We reviewed this book very favourably on its appearance last year, so there is need to do little more now than to express satisfaction at its appearance in an English version. M. Dupré knows Purcell and the Purcell period and literature a long way better than do most English musicians. This is, perhaps, a smallish thing to say, but it has to be said for the benefit of readers who may look askance at a French writer's venturing on such a subject. The translation is readable, though a bit naive here and there. The book is one for the general reader no less than for the musician, and is well illustrated and handsomely dressed.

'The Appreciation of Music: Ten Talks on Musical Form.' By Grace Gridley Wilm.

[Macmillan, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

The title of this book made us shy at it, but we were soon converted by the newness of the author's method. Instead of dealing in vague, picturesque generalities, she discusses the more important musical forms, and then uses them as an approach to historical and biographical matter. It is all done very readably and well, and our only grumble is on the score of the author's apparently complete ignorance concerning British music.

The volume of 'Proceedings' of the Musical Association for the Fifty-fourth Session, 1927-28, is rather above the usual high average of interest. Its six papers deal with 'Music in Public Schools To-day' (Clement Spurling), 'The Chapels Royal and their Music' (E. Stanley Roper), 'Some Problems in the Performance of Bach's Church Cantatas' (W. G. Whittaker), 'Town Waits and their Tunes' (J. C. Bridge), 'Three Musical Parson-Poets of the 17th Century' (Edward W. Naylor), and 'Some of the Lesser-known Songs of Schubert' (A. H. Fox-Strangways). Some good discussions add to the book's value, and there are many music-type illustrations (Leeds: Whitehead & Miller, One guinea).

New Music

PIANOFORTE

Last month an interesting work by David Stephen was noticed here, and it is now followed by the remaining five numbers of 'Six Moods' (Oxford University Press). These pieces confirm one's estimate of the composer's ability; they are out of the ordinary—and if they do not always remain at their best level they never fail to be interesting, even when they fall short of complete success. Most ambitious of them is the third, an ostinato based on a five-note figure similar in build to that used by Ireland in 'The Undertone.' It is a big thing to attempt, particularly if a longish work is aimed at, but Mr. Stephen has done well. The interest flags a little on p. 2, but it picks up again and works to a really fine end, the whole thing being a very compact and well-reasoned piece of writing. And the composer is not merely clever; he has musical insight and something to write about. There is a good deal behind such a work as the fifth of this set, not only of thought but of feeling. The pieces are very interesting, and deserve study.

Fluent and well-written and—naturally in such a piece—light in style, is Norman Demuth's 'Tambourin,' which comes from the same house.

A. M. Goodhart's 'Short Study' (Chester) is graceful and attractive music, not by any means difficult, though it calls for neat and musicianly treatment. This is just what many teachers would be glad to find, and it can be recommended to them.

C. F. Kahnt (Leipsic) sends two works by Fritz Reuter entitled 'Kleine Suite' and 'Leichte Variationen.' The composer writes clear, hard music, and understands his instrument. It is good to find stuff so firm in outline as this, but there is little beauty in it; its astringency (I believe that is the current word) is stimulating at first—afterwards it is apt to irritate. This is particularly the case when, as in the variations, the material is studiedly simple. This is practically a five-finger affair, clever in a way, but not clever enough to be anything except annoyingly trivial.

Vladimir Duketsky's Sonata (Edition Russe de Musique, viâ Hawkes) is another work that is structurally clear and well-handled. Again, however, empty and trivial themes spoil its chance of holding one's attention. The music is simply not worth all the thought and care that has gone into it, and must go into it again if it is to be played, for it is not easy. The same firm sends a pianoforte arrangement of Stravinsky's 'Le Baiser de la Fée' (1928), an allegorical ballet inspired by 'the muse of Tchaikovsky' and dedicated to the memory of that composer. The connection of the ballet with the art of Tchaikovsky makes it difficult to decide how far the style is really typical of the present-day Stravinsky. One sees a good deal of the old devices, but what is new in the methods does not seem an advance. Interesting as this score is, and attractive as is some of the music, one cannot venture any opinion without, at any rate, a hearing of the orchestral version, if not also a study of the choregraphy. T. A.

SONGS

Fifteen songs by John Barkworth call for review this month, and the study of them has been a very interesting one. It is soon noticeable that the composer's outlook and methods are akin to those of Parry, and as one gets further into the songs one feels that Dr. Barkworth would probably count it a very high compliment to be compared with that composer. Their aims and tastes would probably have been much the same, both in poetry and in music. Both may be said to aim at musicianly expression of the emotions of ordinary people; ecstasy, such as comes to men of less dependable sanity, has little place in their work. 'La poesie pure,' they seem modestly to own, is not for them; they gladly take the lower road, achieving a peculiar quality in their music merely by this humility. Both have little use for the various tricks of method by which composers often attain great beauty of sound and a telling, if sometimes facile, effect. They state their ideas in a plain way, for what they are worth, not using poetical or strained language in any attempt to make the underlying thought seem more important than it is. Sometimes here, it is true, as so often in Parry's songs, the music seems to suffer from the composer's not writing really distinctive pianoforte music. 'Stray Nymph of Dian' is a case in point; the particular vivacity that the instrumental writing fails to attain seems a necessary part of the song's individuality; and the total effect is therefore less than it might be. And yet this lack of command over the pianoforte is not altogether to be regretted, since it is a characteristic feature of the composer's whole outlook, which is obviously one of extreme sincerity and some reticence. It is preferable to the other extreme, so well illustrated in some of the foreign songs to be reviewed later, where lack of impulse is emphasised rather than concealed by clever and unnecessary instrumental display.

In other cases, moreover, Dr. Barkworth's accompaniments are entirely adequate; in the highly effective duet arrangement of 'It was a lover and his lass' the texture is really that of the string quartet rather than the pianoforte, but the result is admirably telling. Here, as in all the songs, the interest is kept primarily in the voice parts. Delightful imitative effects and interweaving of melodies give the duet great vivacity. This is certainly one of the very best arrangements of the tune, and ought to be widely sung. Other of the settings seem to me too elaborate; the composer, in dealing with melodies like 'My lodging is on the cold ground,' tries to detail in his work all that the original tune is content to imply. The result is a burden too heavy for it to bear.

One wonders if the songs are issued in chronological order; so much the best are the last half-dozen, while the first two are so far beneath these last in style and achievement. In the settings of M. W. Cannan's poems, particularly that called 'Friendship, 1914,' the music seems suddenly to strike a deeper note altogether, and it is in the last two numbers of all that the composer most fully realises himself. 'Two Talking' is a lovely little work, full of insight and completely felicitous in touch. The sense of effort that marred some of the early songs gives way to a quieter manner, and there is a corresponding increase in effect. It is a beautiful song, of a simplicity and sincerity that are perfectly satisfying. So again in 'The Earth and Man' we feel an intimacy with the writer which is the surest indication of technical problems solved, whilst there is a sense of security that marks mature work. This song, with its Stopford Brooke words and its peculiarly English form of semi-philosophical sentiment, brings us again very close to Parry. Yet it is here that Dr. Barkworth appears fully himself, and the song is one of real beauty. It is a great pleasure to meet work so thoughtful, so modest, and so musical as these songs (MacDonagh Capdeville, Green Street, Leicester Square).

Dorothy Howell, in 'To Sinê in Winter,' has just the brilliance of surface that Dr. Barkworth often lacks; and, unlike his songs, her work does not sound personal or genuinely impassioned. It has all the necessary energy of declamation, yet lacks the true ring of conviction. There is more of this in Evelyn Sharp's simpler and picturesque 'Stars all dotted over the sky' (Cramer).

Paxton's, in addition to T. Haigh's 'A Sea-Burthen,' Havergal Brian's 'When icicles hang,' and Gerrard Williams's attractive 'The Dissembler' (all previously noticed in this column), send Julian Herbage's treatment of Beddoes's 'Dream Pedlary.' The music is neat and has some happy touches, but imports a sentimentality that the poet most felicitously avoided. To hear it in this setting is to realise how bad the poem might have been if it had not been so good. From the same house come Fred Aldington's arrangements of two old English songs. 'My Little Pretty One' is the first; the second is the tune known to most people as 'Oh, Polly, you might have toyed and kissed'; it is set to a poem called 'Of music and of music's power.' Tune and words can only be made to fit at all by the most violent wrenching of the accents of both.

Herbert Howells's 'Old Meg,' just issued by the Oxford University Press, was written in 1923. Since then the harmonic effect on which it largely depends has become almost a cliché; the thing would sound commonplace if it were not used with such unfailing skill and sense of fitness. The workmanship is sensitive, and the touch sure, so the song does not fail of a beautiful effect; I doubt, however, whether its composer would use that formula to-day. From the same publishers is Robin Milford's 'Old Age.' The writing is still amateurish, and the idiom curiously mixed; it looks as if Constant Lambert's discovery of Boyce is telling. Yet there is feeling for the words, and a really expressive handling of the ends of the stanzas. Mr. Milford's outlook is always fresh and sincere; it is a pity his style and handling are not more dependable. Perhaps it would be good to hold things back longer before assuming finality and sending them off to the printer.

Julius Harrison's 'I know a bank,' published by Winthrop Rogers, is of fairly thick texture, and if the necessary lightness is to be attained must be sung allegro, as the composer directs. This will be a blow to some singers; for the generous phrases, so well laid out for the voice, 'to dalliance warm invite the fair.' If the song is sung without rhythm it will be without point: if as the composer intends and marks, the many graceful and sensitive touches should prove very attractive.

A number of German publications come from C. F. Kahnt, of Leipsic. They make one feel that the best of our modern English songs are uncommonly good. These writers have for the most part a thorough command of their job, yet their harmony, elaborate as it is, is in essence terribly commonplace. Th. Hausmann's 'Vier Lieder' are really the worst Dykes harmony carried to the *n*th degree and treated as a philosophy. There is something solemn, portentous, and unreal about it all; and anyway, it's dull stuff. Ernst Smigelski's 'Zwei Lieder' are less pretentious and much more effective; they are not free from the commonplace, but sound thoroughly sincere. Hermann Ambrosius, again, is over-elaborate, and too reminiscent of the gestures of the big Germans. This is much more strongly felt in his Op. 11, 'Drei Lieder.' In Op. 19, 'Zehn Lieder,' the texture is very much lighter and the style more personal. These last songs are for soprano, violin, and pianoforte, and are well worth study. There is real freshness and vitality in the 'Der Morgen' with which the cycle opens, and both 'Der Abend' and 'Die Nacht' have undoubted beauty. Throughout this interesting set of songs the style is much less verbose than that of the earlier examples, and the effect is correspondingly greater. When there are fewer notes there is more light in the music; the lines of melody and the touches of colour have more effect, and the whole thing is more vital. This second cycle marks a very great advance on the earlier one.

Our reviewer slipped last month in stating that Dunhill's 'The Holy Babe' and Rowley's 'Dream Village' were published by Messrs. Stainer & Bell. The publishers are Messrs. Cramer.

CHURCH MUSIC

Some recent issues from the H. W. Gray Co. (Novello) include an unconventional setting by Leo Sowerby of Benedicite omnia opera in the key of D minor. The work, which is decidedly modern in style, is planned on broad lines, and the effective vocal writing, in conjunction with a richly-scored organ part, produces some imposing effects. The voices occasionally divide, but the setting, notwithstanding the composer's harmonic methods, is not really difficult. Much the same may be said of the same writer's setting of Jubilate Deo in B flat, except that the call for division of parts is here almost continuous. In both works the accompaniment appears on three staves. Missing accidentals have been noted in the organ part of the Benedicite, p. 6, bar 4, and the last bar of p. 10, and in the bass part of the last line of the Jubilate.

Other numbers from this house which should prove useful to choirs are S. S. Wesley's full anthem for four voices, 'O how amiable are Thy dwellings,' edited by John E. West, and some adaptations of works, mainly Russian, for women's voices, by Lucy Clark Street. Mr. West's judicious editing should assist both organist and choir in securing an adequate performance of Wesley's music. The arrangements for women's voices are all fairly simple. Tchaikovsky's 'Legend' (S.S.A.), translation by Frederick B. Miles, and 'Bless the Lord, O my soul' (S.S.A.), to music by Ippolitof-Ivanof, may be sung unaccompanied. Bortniansky's 'Cherubim Song' (from the Russian Liturgy) is for S.S.A. and organ (ad lib.), and 'The Cherubic Hymn' (from the Russian Liturgy of St. John Chrysostom), translation by C. W. Douglas and music by Gretchaninov, for S.A. and organ. 'This glad Easter Day,' with English text by Helen A. Dickinson, is an arrangement by Clarence Dickinson of a traditional Norwegian melody for soprano and alto solo and chorus (S.A.), with organ accompaniment.

A beautiful little work for S.A.A.T.B. by Palestrina has been edited for the National Council of Music, University of Wales, by Sir Walford Davies, and —with English and Welsh words paraphrased from the original Italian by T. Gwynn Jones—appears as an anthem under the title, 'Beauty Eternal' (Paxton). It calls for expressive singing, and is of moderate difficulty. The music appears in both notations. Another fine polyphonic work —Byrd's 'Ave Regina Cælorum'—issues, with Latin text, under the editorship of H. B. Collins (Chester). It is for S.A.T.B., and is fairly difficult.

Choirmasters should note that under the title 'Gracious Lord of all our being,' the chorale from Bach's Cantata No. 147, 'Herz und Mund und That und Leben,' has been arranged as an anthem with organ accompaniment by John E. West, and English words by W. G. Rothery (Novello). This chorale, with its graceful, flowing accompaniment, should make a welcome addition to the repertory of church choirs. It is within the powers of any choir capable of singing an ordinary hymn-tune in four-part harmony.

Set 10 of Novello's 'Hymns and Tunes for Sunday School Anniversary Services' provides an admirable selection, some numbers of which will be equally suitable for ordinary use in church or school—e.g., Eric Thiman's strong, simple setting, with descant, of 'Soldiers of Christ, arise,' and Boyd's popular tune, 'Pentecost' to 'Fight the good fight,' also with descant. Hugh Blair's anthem for children, 'Every morning the red sun,' flows brightly in 6-8 time, and for a children's flower service Arthur M. Goodhart's charming setting of 'What can I give Jesus?'—words by Arthur C. Benson—will prove acceptable. Capital tunes are also contributed by E. S. Deans, B. Sellars, A. E. Tate, and C. J. May (optional descant). The music is in both notations, and all the hymns and tunes may also be had in separate numbers.

The same publishers send J. A. Meale's setting for voices and organ of 'I'll praise my Maker' (hymn by Isaac Watts)—straightforward, singable music of a conventional type, which does not always succeed in avoiding the trite and obvious—and Six Hymns and Carols with Descants, composed and arranged by Albert Ham. This last contains effective descant arrangements of 'St. Flavian,' 'Rockingham,' 'Martyrdom,' 'The First Nowell,' and the composer's 'Toronto New' ('Throned upon the awful Tree') and 'Carol of the Shepherds.'

A publication of considerable interest to musicians is that of Philippi de Monte's Missa 'Ultimi miei sospiri' ('Musica Sacra,' Bruges). De Monte (1521-1603) composed a vast number of works, very few of which have been put into modern notation. The editor of the Mass under consideration—J. van Nuffel—tells us that the library of Brussels Conservatory contains the manuscripts of eight Masses, three of which have already been published, and that it is hoped eventually to publish the remainder. The present work is for six voices, and is based on a madrigal by Ph. Verdelot bearing the same title; this madrigal is included with the Mass. The work is beautifully produced, in stiff covers. From the same house come J. van Nuffel's 'Missa Paschalis,' for two equal voices, and 'In Festo St. Teresiæ a Jesu Infante'—a collection of Introits, Graduals, &c., in plainsong, with accompaniment. The Mass is a musicianly work, each movement of which, except the Creed, is based on a fragment of plainsong. In the Creed, phrases set to the traditional plainsong alternate with simple a cappella settings for S.S.A. In the other movements the writing for the voices is free and independent, and a most interesting organ accompaniment—in modern idiom—is laid out on three staves. The text is in Latin.

UNISON

'A Little Song Book of the Nations' (1*s.* 6*d.*) has been put together by A. E. W. Thomas, and Hubert Foss has written accompaniments that require no more than the skill to play a hymn-tune, and yet give a pleasant and sufficient support to the voices. A good many of the songs can be sung by a four-part choir; or those low-voiced people who can read a bass part can add that alone to the melody. A foreword by Viscount Cecil commends the book particularly to the attention of audiences at League of Nations meetings. Its usefulness in school is obvious, for the seventeen songs are well selected. Not all are folk-songs, in the strict sense of the word; England, for instance, is represented by 'Drink to me only,' and Germany by the grand tune to the Easter hymn that we know best by its refrain of 'Alleluia!' ('Let joyful praise to Heaven ascend'). Russia's song tells of the exploits of Stenka Rasin. Schools that have a gramophone may like to get the new record of Glazounov's tone-poem so named, and sing the song before hearing the orchestral piece. A booklet giving the words of the songs may be had for 1½*d.* (a shilling a dozen). This is a good addition to the library of popular song-books.

Alec Rowley's 'When the moon is up' trips lightly, in six-eight, with tip-toe dotted quavers (Paxton). His 'Sparrows' is for quite small children—dainty and light (Cramer).

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

Elizabeth Poston's 'Balulalow' is a sacred cradle-song that can be sung at any time, and in any place, but is especially suitable for Christmas use in church or Sunday school. It asks for refined, tender treatment: a charming, easy piece. Ivor Davies's 'Swinging' is also for S.S. It goes in the recognised rhythm (six-eight), with easy fluency, if with no striking point of freshness. An accent on 'in' might have been avoided. Children cannot too early learn the simple principles of just and expressive accentuation. We do not let them use wrong stresses in reciting, and there is no reason for giving them examples of that in music (Hawkes).

Cyril Jenkins sets Blake's 'The Lamb' for S.S. The second part keeps on the lower middle range most of the time. The chromatics slightly weaken the value of the song, I feel; it is pleasant music, though rather square in step (Paxton).

In 'Novello's School Songs' series appears Set 5 of 'National Songs with Descants,' arranged by Geoffrey Shaw and H. A. Chambers. The preface gives some wise, bright advice on the use of the second part. It offers splendid practice in independence, and in the study of balance and subtlety in proportioning the weight to that of the tune. All these descants are easy, and generally note-for-note, though they do not stick slavishly to that principle, but introduce some artistic counterpoint. The eight songs can all be had separately for 1½*d.* to 3*d.* each; the set costs eightpence.

MALE-VOICE

Hugh Roberton has arranged for T.T.B.B. a song (the original form of which is not stated) by G. W. Martin, a last century composer. 'Haste, ye soft gales' is the title, and the music, though not of first glee-quality, is amiably tuneful, and easy (Williams).

MIXED-VOICE

Some charming arrangements of old songs are those by Dr. Bairstow ('The Oak and the Ash'), Dr. Whittaker ('The Lincolnshire Poacher'), E. Duncan-Rubbra ('Afton Water'), and H. E. Randerson ('Now Robin, lend to me thy bow' and 'To the maypole haste away'). All are for S.A.T.B. The 'Poacher' especially has some fine, bold, swinging harmony, and Dr. Bairstow's arrangement is a capital bit of simple, musicianly work. 'Now Robin' has a verse in canon for S.A. and one for T.B., a happy idea. I like to see arrangers getting more variety into their music. There are all sorts of chances for neat, resourceful treatment, without butchering a tune to make an arranger's holiday (Oxford University Press).

Ernest Bullock's 'As I walked forth' (words from Playford) is a flowing S.A.T.B. setting of graceful carriage, needing delicate singing—a good, enjoyable counterpart of the superior part-song of Victorian times (Hawkes).

Another Roberton arrangement is that of Purcell's 'The Mavis,' for S.A.T.B. This has one or two simple, short runs, and needs a light, aerated manner. It could be sung by a choir of no great experience, if it has found how to phrase smoothly and take breath quickly (Williams).

Bantock's 'The Lake Isle of Innisfree' (S.A.T.B. and S. solo) is likely to please, with its grave, quiet motion and placid harmony. The women's parts are divided into four for a while (Cramer).

Two of J. H. Foulds's 'Scottish Celtic Songs' are to hand—'Quindry Bay' and 'John Hielandman.' The first, sub-titled 'A Song at Sundown,' has a facile vein of comfortably chromatic harmony that many choirs will appreciate. The other is a brisk, bounding affair, 'very rhythmic and undeviating.' Orchestral parts for this may be hired (Paxton).

Frank Idle hits on a happy tune and graceful harmony for Marlowe's 'Come, live with me' (S.A.T.B.). The song has an inviting lilt, and is of the kind that quite small choirs will like to add to their repertory. Church choirs, for instance, will find it useful for use at social affairs.

ORCHESTRA

Alessandro Scarlatti's 'Concerto Grosso in F minor' has been added to the collection Perlen Alter Kammermusik (C. F. Kahnt, Leipsic), edited by Arnold Schering from the 'original' (English) copy which was published in 1740—some years after the composer's death. The present edition is for strings and pianoforte, but I rather believe that the effect would be enhanced if the organ were to take the part of the pianoforte. It is an excellent example of Scarlatti's art, and deserves to be known and studied, especially by school orchestras. Technically, it offers no difficulty, and thus the whole attention can be devoted to balance of tone, accuracy in attack, and unanimity of colour and expression.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Sterndale Bennett's Trio-Serenade (Paxton) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, is one of those light and graceful things one passed by almost without notice while these qualities were fairly common. To-day we are inclined to prize them more highly, as they are getting very much rarer. Neither a light touch nor grace will be found in Theodor Hausmann's Sonata for violin and pianoforte (C. F. Kahnt, Leipsic). This composer's aims are different; his goal, it would seem, lies more in the direction of solidity of structure and clever and ingenious, rather than graceful or charming, harmonic combinations. In spite of its modern flavour, the music is never obscure or unduly complex.

FLUTE

Just now old sonatas appear to be fashionable. A 'cello recital without an old sonata or two has not been heard in London for years, and there have been recitals at which nothing but old sonatas could be heard. I sometimes wonder whether these enthusiasms are likely to last. I am second to no one in my admiration for the masterpieces of the past. But there is no denying the fact that these ancients had tricks as well as art and mannerisms as well as stylish manners. Perhaps because their trills have been so often served as a cold lesson in technique my heart fails me when I see as many trills as there are in the first movement of Pietro Locatelli's Sonata No. 1, edited by J. H. Feltkamp for flute and pianoforte (Oxford University Press). Anyhow, it was with a distinct feeling of relief that I came to the final Presto with its very simple progressions and business-like air. But I have no doubt that in the hands of a virtuoso the Sonata will sound effective enough. A Sonatina for flute and pianoforte by Hermann Ambrosius (C. F. Kahnt) has two pleasing, lively movements, and is well written for the instrument. The Adagio non troppo, in 5-8, is bound, I fear, to sound a little monotonous, as the design lacks variety. F. B.

We have received eight numbers of the Cotta Edition, of which the Oxford University Press is the British agent. No. 907 consists of old Viennese dances, by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Lanner, and Johann Strauss the elder. The dances are mostly arranged by Hans Gal from four-handed and orchestral originals. Among the best of a charming set is the 'Romantic Waltz' of Lanner, who on this form can at least hold his own with the Strausses. Karl Hermann Pillney edits a collection of old French pieces—Louis and François Couperin, de Chambonnières, d'Aquin, and Rameau (No. 914). Eight Sonatas by Scarlatti—an unhackneyed selection—are edited by Lydia Hoffmann-Behrendt (No. 915). A Russian group makes up No. 916—pieces by Glinka, Rubinstein, Borodin, Moussorgsky, and Tchaikovsky, the editor being Waldemar Lütschig. The interest of No. 924 is mainly antiquarian—keyboard dances of the 16th century, collected by Dr. Hermann Halbig. The selection is from Spanish, German, Dutch, and English sources. The evolution of the Sonata is shown in a set of essays in that form by Bach's sons, Wilhelm Friedemann, Carl Philipp Emanuel, John Christoph Friedrich, and John Christian, edited by Kurt Schubert (No. 925); and two double-number books are devoted to Brahms (Walter Rehberg). Nos. 918-19 contain the E flat minor Scherzo, the Four Ballades, Two Rhapsodies, and Three Intermezzos, Op. 117; in Nos. 920-21 are Op. 116 (Fantasia and Caprices), Seven Klavierstücke, Op. 118, and Four Klavierstücke, Op. 119. With its generous spacing, bold type, and erudite prefaces (only in German, unfortunately) the Cotta edition puts most of its present-day rivals in the shade.

Tallis's forty-part Motet, 'Spem in alium nunquam habui,' is one of that large body of works that everybody knows by name and few by note. The general view is that it is merely an ingenious curiosity consisting of little more than an elaborately set out chord of G. Actually it is a polyphonic masterpiece. The Oxford University Press has just issued (45*s.*), in full size, the edition brought out in vol. vi. of 'Tudor Church Music.' The size is about two feet by a foot and a half. In the 'Tudor Church Music' edition it was reduced to a fourth of these unhandy dimensions. Why is this marvellous work never heard? Several performances are recorded as having taken place during the despised Victorian period. Here is an opening for the B.B.C. National Chorus, which might well include it in one of its Queen's Hall schemes. (Since writing the above we have heard that the Newcastle Bach Choir will shortly sing the work.)

At Oaklands Music Club, on February 16, the Junior Orchestra of the Philharmonic Choir played two movements from Mozart's G minor Symphony, and other numbers. Mr. Ernest Read conducted.

Gramophone Notes

H.M.V.

For once in a way the best orchestral records have not come from America. The San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, under Alfred Hertz, play Mendelssohn's Wedding March with much less stirring effect than is due—for, after all, 'tis a good march. This performance lacks both rhythm and brilliance. On the other side is the Entr'acte from 'Rosamunde.' We needn't send across the Atlantic for recordings of either work, unless they can be superlative, which these are not (1568).

The Detroit Symphony Orchestra comes off rather better in Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody, conducted by Ossip Gabrilowitsch. But how poor this Spanish dance material wears! Apparently the monotonous harmonic basis is the cause. Anyhow, I can raise little interest in it save when it has been gingered up by a de Falla—not always then (E522).

After these rather dull beginnings we are roused by a record of two extracts from 'The Fire Bird'—'The Princesses play with the Golden Apples' and 'The Infernal Dance of Kastchei's Subjects,' played by the London Symphony Orchestra, under Coates. This is a brilliant bit of work all round, and makes us hope for more from the same tap (D1510).

It is good news that we are to have some of Haydn's Symphonies, played by John Barbirolli's Chamber Orchestra. A start has been made with one of the best—the Symphony in D, known as the 'London.' There is delicacy, with some real pianissimo playing, and excellent clarity. In the Finale I should have liked a little more pace: we have the allegro without the spirito. And there is a tendency—strangely common among even the most experienced conductors—to slow down the time slightly during quiet passages in longer notes. This Finale is one of those in which the composer draws on Croatian folk-tune, and a bit more vigour—even roughness—would not have been amiss. But, all round, the Haydn series has made a capital start (C1608-10).

Scoring both brilliant and elusive is the main interest in Ravel's 'Alborada del gracioso'—a transcription by the composer of one of his early pianoforte works. It is well played by an unnamed orchestra (presumably French), conducted by Piero Coppola (D1594).

A good sample of light orchestral music is a record of Mark Weber and his players in arrangements of Sinding's 'Rustle of Spring' and a Waldteufel Waltz (C1630).

The only chamber music record is of Frank Bridge's Idyll No. 1, played by the Virtuoso String Quartet with all the vividness and contrast we expect of that fine party (C1593).

The pick of pianoforte records is one of Backhaus in four Chopin Etudes—Nos. 1 in A flat, 12 in C minor, 2 in F minor, and 11 in A minor. As usual with Backhaus records, the tone is far above the average. The playing is tip-top. The only fault findable is that the pace of the F minor study is excessive (DB1178).

Cyril Scott continues the recording of his own works with 'Lotus Land' and 'Souvenir de Vienne.' I have to repeat my criticism of last month—that the playing is too level in power, and altogether less sensitive than we expect from Mr. Scott (B2894).

Piquant fiddling is that of Renée Chemet in Chabrier's 'Album Leaf' and a Berceuse by a composer labelled as 'Groolez,' but who is probably Grovlez (DA812); and of Kreisler in Albeniz's Tango and de Falla's Spanish Dance from 'La Vida Breve' (DA1009).

I cannot find much that is interesting in a couple of 'cello solos by Tartini and Valentine, arranged by Salmon, and played by Beatrice Harrison (B2896).

Mark Hambourg does well in playing Debussy's 'Claire de lune,' and then lapses with a couple of shanties—'Shenandoah' and 'Billy Boy.' We have already been over-shantied and over-spiritualled; heaven forbid that pianists should now take up the craze! With the aid of words and good singing many were enjoyable, but the musical interest is too slight to stand instrumental transcription (B2935). (Is the supply of good, unrecorded pianoforte music running short? And violin music? A month or two ago we had Kreisler playing 'The Old Folks at Home'; and his two solos mentioned above are both transcriptions. At a recent Albert Hall recital he played a long programme in which hardly an item was genuine violin music.)

A number of important choral records—Westminster Abbey, Westminster Cathedral, and Leeds Festival choirs—have been issued, but copies have not reached me. I mention this so that readers may understand why they are not reviewed.

BRUNSWICK

Enterprise is shown in the choice of a work that has apparently had only one performance in England so far, and very few anywhere else—Respighi's 'Trittico Botticelliano.' This is an orchestral Suite in three movements, based on three famous Botticelli pictures: 'Spring,' 'The Adoration of the Magi,' and 'The Birth of Venus.' The orchestra written for is small—one each of wood-wind, one horn, one trumpet, triangle, small bells, celesta, harp, pianoforte, and strings. Respighi has a capital sense of colour, and does much with this modest force. 'Spring' is, perhaps, the best of the three pieces. In the 'Adoration' much use is made of a portion of the plainsong melody sung in England to 'O come, Emmanuel,' but Respighi seems to be unable to do more with it than repeat it with some queer major effects where we expect minor. In all three the scoring atones for a shortage of thematic interest. The recording is good, save for some over-keenness in the strings in 'Spring.' The players are the London Chamber Orchestra, conducted by Anthony Bernard (30131-32). (By an unfortunate arrangement the 'Adoration' comes on the second side of the first disc and the first of the second. This is surely a case where the order of the pieces matters less than their convenient disposition.)

Georg Kulenkampff, a violinist unknown here, though (we are told) with a big reputation in the Fatherland, plays Brahms's fifth Hungarian Dance showily, overdoing the tempo vagaries, I think. For companion piece he has a very engaging Allegretto by Boccherini (7006).

Brailowsky draws on the most familiar of Chopin—the E flat Nocturne and the A flat Waltz.

His playing is so good that it is a pity he should just take a point off it by some occasional eccentricity in the rhythm of the Waltz. (Odd, how these swagger players seem to be afraid of a plain three or four in a bar! They will persist in jazzing it slightly, under the cover of that misunderstood word rubato.) (80040.)

Organ records from Germany are rare. Here is one of Alfred Sittard playing Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, in St. Michael's Church, Hamburg. There is a long-drawn echo; at the end of some phrases we can even follow the response note by note for a bar or so. Hence confusion in some of the brilliant passages. Sittard's pace is pretty much the same as that of English organists. Clearly he is a good player. But this record is rather below the English standard—which is not yet very good, and far from being worthy of our fine players (80039).

Alfred Piccaver sings 'Ah! si ben mio,' from 'Trovatore,' and 'O tu che in seno agli angeli,' from 'Il Forza del Destino.' Here is surely the most appealing tenor voice in opera at the present time. Such ease and mellowness on high notes that are usually shouted or strangled! Yet Piccaver seems to lack personality, and he stays too long on a level of power and feeling. If we could but add to that Lincolnshire (is it?) voice a Mediterranean temperament, what an operatic artist we should have! (50115).

The label tells me that Stanley Maxted is a tenor, otherwise I should have called him a baritone. However, the thing that matters is that he sings far too heavily a batch of the 'When we were very young' songs. Only a first-rate style and sense of humour on the part of a singer can make us overlook the fact that A. A. Milne's delightful verses are inadequately set by Fraser-Simson. The music is essentially commonplace, and this performance tends to bring the defect to the surface (3888-89).

Frederick Firth is one of the best of the little army of boy sopranos who are now emulating Thomas Lough. Firth sings 'My heart ever faithful' and Handel's 'O Lord, whose mercies'—good choices. His tone is pure and phrasing good. The organ is a bit on the lumpy side in the Bach. Frederick will go far, I believe (20074).

COLUMBIA

Of all Mozart's formidable stack of symphonies only three are well known. So neglected are the remainder that there exists a justifiable impression that, compared with the G minor, the E flat, and the 'Jupiter,' they are out of the hunt. The recording of No. 34, in C (K. 338), is a commendable bit of enterprise. The orchestra is the Royal Philharmonic and the conductor Beecham, and concerning the performance there is no need to say more than that expectations roused by such a combination are fully satisfied. The Symphony is a bright and thoroughly engaging work, which I enjoyed from start to finish. I hope the reception of this departure from the hackneyed will be such as to lead to further exploring in this neglected field. An informative leaflet is issued with the records (L2220-22).

More Mozart comes in the G major Concerto No. 17 (K. 453), played by the Budapest Orchestra and Dohnányi, and conducted from the keyboard by the soloist. This feat was performed by the same artists at Queen's Hall not long ago. I am still not convinced that there is anything but a disadvantage in reverting to an old custom for which there was so little to be said that it was dropped as soon as the art of conducting began to be developed. Obviously, it is practicable in none but rather simple music, and even then there must be moments when either the pianoforte-playing or the conducting must suffer slightly. There is some interest in an ordinary concert performance of the kind, because most people like to see the dual feat; but by gramophone or wireless there is nothing in it. This Concerto is less good Mozart than the Symphony mentioned above, but it is still attractive as a whole. The Finale is especially good. The playing is lively, and the recording really admirable (L2215-18).

There is a notable set of pianoforte records in the second series of Chopin Nocturnes played by Godowsky—the G minor (Op. 37, No. 1), F major, F sharp major, F sharp minor, C sharp minor, and D flat. I still find Godowsky a little unequal, some splendid moments alternating with curiously dry patches. There is a spoken Introduction by Ernest Newman, and the album contains notes from the same source. These are models of condensed criticism and information. (But in speaking of the bare fifth and octave opening of the C sharp minor Nocturne, why does Mr. Newman say that the listener hears the major third 'subconsciously'? The E sharp is easily distinguished by the physical ear of any average musician.) (L2168-71.)

I pick out for special mention two widely dissimilar vocal records: Edna Thomas in a couple of 'spirituals'—'Nobody knows de trouble I sees' and 'Run, Mary, run' (5154); and an excellent boy soprano, John Gwilym Griffiths, who sings 'Where'er you walk,' and, backed up by an effective choir, Spohr's 'As pants the hart' (9615).

A record of unusual interest is that of 'New Year's Eve at St. Paul's'—the wrong side of the Cathedral door, of course. Here the noise of the crowd is reproduced so faithfully that it is almost terrifying. (I have seen a nervous person blench at it!) There is human interest and historic value in such a record as this. Some day, when folk are wiser, gramophonists may turn this disc on and marvel that thousands of apparently sane people should spoil their work on the first day of the year by staying up most of the preceding night kicking up a hullabaloo and exchanging microbes and germs. And most of them—the crowd, not the germs—come from the hard-headed and sensible side of the Tweed! (5197).

Player-Piano Notes

ÆOLIAN

Audiographic Duo-Art.—One has heard much concerning the technical difficulty of Balakirev's 'Islamey,' so that it is of special interest to meet with a roll containing it. The player is Beryl Rubinstein, who shows a fine mastery. The music depicts the mustering together of Oriental tribes, and is a very vivid and exciting piece of work. There is a listener's introduction by Edward Mitchell, and a picturesque running commentary on the music is provided by Percy Scholes (D775). This roll may be had in the 'Pianola' Series (D776).

From these ferocities we descend to Chaminade's 'Autumn.' Clarence Adler is the capable player, and the notes are by Paul Silva Herard and A. Forbes Milne (D789) (Pianola D790).

We go East again with 'The Song of the Haulers on the Volga,' arranged by Harriet Cady and played by Rudolph Ganz. The transcription lacks variety, especially of power. There are some cases in which the obvious thing is the right thing, and the only way to make very much of this overworked song is to treat it on the familiar lines of 'The Band Passes'—ppp to ff, and back again. Moreover, the writing for the left hand is unnecessarily thick. The literary matter is provided by G. Kirkham Jones (D785, Pianola D786).

Duo-Art.—Frederic Lamond continues his transcription of Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony with the third movement—the Valse. The touch of commonplace in the music comes out when played on the pianoforte; the orchestral colour disguises it (521).

Lewis Richards plays an old friend in the Turkish March from Mozart's A major Sonata (6786).

A very attractive roll is that containing MacDowell's 'To a Water Lily' and 'March Wind.' The latter is an excellent sample of the composer's outdoor tone-painting. Rudolph Ganz's playing is admirable (7208).

The slow movement ('Indian Lament') from Dvorák's Sonatina for violin and pianoforte has been arranged by Francis Moore, who gives a very good performance of it, without, however, persuading us that the piece is particularly suitable for transcription (6800).

Liszt's arrangement of 'Cujus Animam' is played by Frederic Lamond. Liszt does rather less with it than we should expect (7206).

Debussy's piquant little Prelude (No. 6 of the second book), known as 'General Lavine,' is capitally touched off by Eugène d'Albert (0345).

Two light rolls are of A. Waterman's Valse, Op. 8, No. 1, played by the composer (0346), and of a selection from 'Show Boat,' played by Phil. Ohman (7293).

Hand-played.—Chopin's Nocturne in F minor is played by Josef Hofmann—rather too slowly, I feel. The flow of the rhythm is hindered by his apparent reluctance to play four even quavers; he usually manages to dot one of them (A1127*e*). Irene Scharrer gives a charming performance of the Intermezzo from Schumann's 'Faschingsschwank' (A1129*d*).

One of the very best of Bach rolls is that of the Toccata and Fugue in G minor, played by Harold Samuel. This is among the lesser known of the clavier works, and consists of a brilliant introductory passage, followed by a movement that recalls Purcell, a lively fugue in dotted rhythm, suggestive of a dance, and a final flourish. Samuel makes a very attractive affair of it by his clean rhythmic playing (A1131*f*). Excellently played, too, is Godard's fifth Mazurka, the performer being Rudolph Ganz (A1133*f*).

Metrostyle.—The only roll received for review is an exceptionally pleasing one—Albeniz's 'Tango,' Op. 165, No. 2, transcribed by Godowsky. A player may make much of it with very little trouble (T30416*a*).

BLÜTHNER

Albert Friedenthal manages the florid passages in Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp, Op. 15, No. 2, with much finish and neatness. This is, in fact, the outstanding merit of his playing. There is no excessive rubato; indeed, a little more 'give' here and there would have been welcome (55781).

It is interesting to contrast two widely different conceptions of the waltz and its treatment—one by Rachmaninov, Op. 10, No. 2, played by Karol Szreter, and another by Scriabin, Op. 38, played by Walter Bonim. The performance in each case is good, and both make most attractive rolls. The Rachmaninov (59588) is full of sharp vitality, and the rhythm is clean and definite. The Scriabin (59829) is exactly opposite in mood and style; it radiates warmth with its luscious harmonies, and there is a general air of languor. It works up to a brilliant ending.

If a study in chromatics and virtuosity is required, I recommend 'A Prole do Bebe' (No. 1), by Lobos, played by Mark Hambourg, who takes full advantage of its opportunity for agile display (59919). Another good roll by the same performer is the 'Tanz der Gaukler,' from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera 'Schneeflockchen' (59920). Both these are exceptionally clear and well cut.

There are two 'Fairy Tales' by Medtner, Op. 20, No. 2 (59585), and Op. 26, No. 3 (59584). Karol Szreter is the pianist; his performances are above reproach. The music itself is full of colour, and somewhat reminiscent of Chopin.

The two Max Reger pieces, 'From my Diary,' Book 1, No. 6 (55573), and Book 2, No. 4 (55574), are not everybody's music, but they are among the less formidable of this composer's works, and there is considerable appeal in both, especially the second. They are similar in mood, each being contemplative. They are played by the composer. The Sonata in B flat of Schubert is good, the Scherzo (on the second roll of the set) particularly so. The Allegro which follows is somewhat more serious, but both movements give a care-free impression, and are typical of Schubert at his best. Theodor Blumer gives a sympathetic performance (59161-63).

Last, but far from being least, is a fine Prelude of Rachmaninov's, Op. 32, No. 12. It is unnecessary to comment further on Karol Szreter's playing—all his rolls are extraordinarily good (59580).

A MODERN APPROACH TO MUSIC-TEACHING:

II.—MUSIC TEACHING—ITS AIM AND PURPOSE:

A PLEA FOR EXPERIMENTAL METHODS

By Norah H. Bore

In a profession such as music-teaching, in which the teacher is handicapped by the layman's demand for tangible results, there is a danger of the value of experimental methods being overlooked. By force of circumstances the teacher tries to find short cuts in evolving teaching methods to meet his needs.

Two courses are open to him. He may bow to authority and glean his methods from the teaching experience of the ablest in his profession; or, by a process of trial and error, he may evolve methods of his own. Each means of preparation has its use and its danger. The former tends to stultify the originality of the teacher; the latter is often carried out at the expense of the pupil. The ideal course lies doubtless mid-way between the two. Valuable time may be saved by a preparatory course of training which makes the student conversant with the latest educational methods of dealing with his subject. Such technical and historical knowledge is now within the easy reach of all. The efficient work being carried on in this department in the many excellent training schools in different parts of the country is one of the most encouraging aspects of musical education to-day.

There is, however, a point beyond which the work of the training school cannot go. A moment arrives when the teacher must shoulder his own responsibilities and solve his own problems. Theory and actual practice are widely different. The thorough-going disciple may find his reliance upon the experience of others strangely deceptive unless he temper it with a due proportion of individual initiative.

The first years of teaching are usually the most difficult. The teacher finds actuality very different from the pictures of it as conceived in imagination, or seen through another person's eyes. He is often discouraged by mediocre results or apparent failure. This stage in a teacher's evolution is nevertheless extremely valuable. It is then that he comes to grips with actuality; he measures the dimensions of the task he is tackling; he experiments with his own powers, discovering what compromises or alterations are necessary in his educational theories to make them serviceable for the task which confronts him. Finally—most important of all—he realises his individual approach to the whole problem. He tests theories, and modifies them to meet his own requirements, and where these fail, evolves new ones to serve his needs. He is, in other words, beginning to use the experimental method.

A second stage of initiation into the craft of teaching is reached when the teacher throws overboard many ideas, admirable in themselves, but unsuited to his particular temperament or to his approach to his work. It is only when this has been done and the necessary adjustments effected between the personality of the teacher and his work, that he experiences in it any sense of mastery or certainty.

These are doubtless the commonplaces of all teaching experience. Every teacher would agree that experiment lies behind successful achievement. I venture, however, to insist upon this fact, since I feel that its implications have not yet been sufficiently accepted. Many teachers follow the method up to the point of evolving individual methods of imparting knowledge; having discovered these for themselves they are content. But surely our experiments and searchings should be extended much further. It is not sufficient to evolve a successful technique or a satisfactory method of handling a certain type of pupil—a much wider field remains to be explored if we are to cover the whole problem. We cannot ignore the implications of the subject or fail to co-ordinate these with the issues which lie behind them. This is the danger of all teaching. It is easy to become engrossed in the task of the immediate present, and to forget that this present is chiefly valuable in so far as it serves as an experimental ground where important adjustments to life may be made. How many of us, as music teachers, have considered what our share in these adjustments ought to be, and what our responsibility is? What data have we accumulated as to the part played by music in the life of the child? Do we really understand the motives which urge children—or their parents on their behalf—to seek proficiency in some one branch of performance? Is this motive worthy or ignoble? How should we deal with it in order to weave it deftly into the loom of life? Have we realised the multiplicity of motives other than a love of music which enter into our pupils' work, and have we sought to understand how we should deal with them?

Again have we given any consideration to the medium we are handling? Questions such as these confront us: What is music? What is its contribution to life? Or, with reference to our methods of handling this medium, we ask: What is our aim in teaching music? What are the limits of our subject? For what results are we working? Most of these questions require definite answers if we would know where we stand with regard to our work.

A teacher's work may be limited in another way. It is so easy to approach the subject with a personal bias, and base all musical experience on the mere evidence of individual reactions. It is important to remember that our reactions are not necessarily those of other people. Rhythm may to one be the predominating factor in music; to another, melodic or harmonic combinations. It is quite possible that we may refer to entirely different things when we use the generic term 'music.' It is here that some experience of practical psychology is valuable. A few simple experiments are enough to convince us how varied and how complex are the constituents which make up the individual personal equation. Do we always remember, to take a very simple illustration, that musical memory works through different senses in different individuals—that there are visual memorisers, motor, tactual, and aural memorisers, as well as varying combinations of all four? Surely it is necessary that the teacher should be aquainted with the predominant sense in himself and in each of his pupils! Otherwise he may require his pupils to memorise by methods totally unsuited to their musical equipment, thus confronting them with apparently insuperable difficulties.

It is obvious that experimental psychology can play a very helpful rôle in throwing light on the music-teacher's work. Such a method, however, requires data from reliable sources in sufficient quantity if it is to achieve any results of value. The co-operation of as many teachers as possible is needed. By pooling the fruits of their experience they will show their mutual goodwill, and their enthusiasm to add to the common store of knowledge.

The variety of the reactions in adults and children to music; the differing significance which we give to such qualities as rhythm, pitch, melody, consonance, and dissonance, afford a rich field for research, which may surprise the teacher who imagines that his own reactions are representative of those of other people and who tends to project his musical ego upon his pupils.

In this article the writer does not seek to answer any of the questions which have been raised. An opportunity for this may occur later. The present object is rather to awaken thought or provoke opposition, since every expression of opinion is valuable as a revelation of yet another angle from which the problem may be approached.

[Note.—In succeeding articles the writer will try to deal with separate aspects of the question, mentioning some of the research which has already been attempted in each field and indicating problems yet awaiting solution or books which may be consulted.

POINTS FROM LECTURES

A recent feature (though not quoted below) has been the growing number of women lecturers. Although their utterances do not appear to have been weighty or original, their performances have been excellent, and therefore popular. There will always be room for lecture-recitalists who can both speak acceptably and illustrate aptly, and in view of the feminine preponderance in the musical world, there is a promising future for the woman lecturer.

As an aftermath of the Schubert Centenary, lecturers are beginning to quibble about statements made by earlier speakers. Evidently Mr. Rutland Boughton was in mind when Mr. H. B. Chaplin Baldwin addressed the Brighton French Club, and referred to a recent speaker as having said that 'Schubert's music was of the middle class.' Music was essentially democratic; the lecturer in question (Mr. Boughton?) was a highbrow who, apparently, because Schubert's music was full of melody and easy to follow and understand, considered it music for the middle classes!

Mr. Boughton (if it was he) would probably deny the impeachment that he is a highbrow, but he did, at the Brighton Union Church, define Schubert as the master musician to the middle classes. 'His love-songs are never anything but the most respectable middle-class affairs, compounded wholly of sentiment. . . . He is not one of the greatest of musicians, but he is the greatest song writer.'

Mr. Rutland Boughton was severely critical of other composers. His starting-point was that the greatest music written under the Christian civilization was the expression of that civilization: the music of Bach. Bach wrote music when the Christian religion was coming to an end. His was the period of courtly flunkeys. Bach was somewhat of a lackey to this Court sentiment. Haydn was a lackey all his life. Mozart was worse than a lackey; his powers were wasted. Beethoven was born into the same bondage, but he was definitely in rebellion. 'Schubert got clear away from the purely decorative aspects of music. He brought into music emotion, beauty, and realism. He brought the song back to real life.'

A discussion between Manchester clergy and the Manchester Organists' Association was so fruitful that a resolution was passed 'that representatives of the clergy of Manchester be invited to meet representatives of the Association at a round-table conference to discuss matters of Church music with a view to forming a programme for a general public debate to be held later.' At the preliminary discussion the Rev. F. Paton Williams (St. Ann's Church) said that there were three centres in each church: the altar, the pulpit, and the organ, and it was fatal for one to try to take the others' place. A good sermon would fill a church just as much as good music. Dr. K. L. Parry (Chorlton Road) said that to him, as a Nonconformist, it seemed that a Hallé concert was, in the eyes of God, just as sacred as Church music. The organist should play first for the glory of God, and in the second place to produce an effect on the spirit of the congregation. Dr. A. W. Wilson (Manchester Cathedral) replied on behalf of the organists. Musical festivals had revolutionised choral music everywhere except in the churches, and people would no longer be content with inferior hymns. The right policy was to pick the best organist available, give him a free hand for five years, and sack him if he failed.

A contrary opinion to that of the Rev. Paton Williams named above was given at a meeting of the Hull and District Organists' Association, quite unconnected with the Manchester discussion. Mr. Lawson said he had yet to hear the sermon which would inspire him. The inspiration he derived was from the music. This remark was provoked by a Mr. Porter's view that people ran after a man because of personality.

The abuse and the neglect of the pianoforte formed part of Dr. F. W. Wadely's lecture at Carlisle on 'The Pianoforte and its Predecessors.' It was Mendelssohn, he said, who popularised the pianoforte and made it a necessary article of domestic furniture. Its neglect was almost as distressing as its abuse and ill-treatment. 'Sometimes we found the grand pianoforte used as a plant stand, or an upright pianoforte used just to cover the place where the drawing-room carpet was most worn. The pianoforte was not getting the attention it used to do. Some people were apt to say that was a bad sign, but he did not agree with that. He thought it meant that the musical public was taking its music in another form. At any rate, those who had gramophone shares did not see anything wrong. We had simply got to move with the times. The pianoforte would always be the most convenient medium for musicians to express themselves, because it was so self-contained.'

Sir Hugh Allen, speaking of Bach's teaching, at Blackheath, compared the methods of handwriting and music. If a written communication was received by anyone, it was first read, and told to someone else afterwards. The same principle should be followed in music. Nine out of every ten who bought music immediately rushed to the pianoforte to see how it sounded. That was just what they should avoid. It should be read first and played afterwards. It was not difficult, but just a matter of method. When Bach's children grew a little tired of playing scales, he wrote a whole series of little pieces, to make the occupation more interesting. In that way the child was being taught the very best basis of method and harmony, at the same time learning the fingering and technique.

Sir Henry Coward, at the Leeds Rotary Club, returned to an old topic with fresh arguments.

The witness of history, he said, was that the decay of the great nations of the past had been caused by the nature of the ethics and morality derived from their form of pleasure. That meant we would have to avoid the fate of the nine great empires which had dominated and declined, and must see that their lotus-eating did not take the place of working, and that in following a wearisome, irritating reiteration of the cacophonic imbecility, we did not allow jazz to pay fat dividends while steel, cutlery, and plate languished and high thinking and spirituality decayed.

The team spirit was another theme when Sir Henry Coward addressed the members of the Sheffield Orpheus Male Choir. His impression about the future was that choral music would have more to do with the uplift of the people than any other special thing. Choral singing promoted the team spirit, and never left any base feelings behind. It was also helpful socially, and there were a great many other things connected with choral singing which made him feel that it was his duty to encourage that type of work.

The same important question of the future of English choirs was the basis of speeches in London at the annual dinner of the Philharmonic Choir. Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott criticised professionalism in music, describing it as 'the ruination of the higher side of music,' and 'the curse of the whole situation.' 'With it,' he said, 'you get exploitation of fine music for purely personal interests. That is not the right spirit in which music should be done. There is something nauseating about the whole of this professional business. A concert should be like a festival.' He could see a future danger to choirs because of the lack of men members. He thought one man in a choir was worth two women. The ladies present dissented. There was also a difficulty about getting choir-boys. 'If the boys,' he said, 'do not come forward, the whole of the music in England will eventually be run by women.' (A feminine voice asked, 'Why not?')

Mr. Geoffrey Shaw, speaking on the same festive occasion, said he saw danger in the prices charged for many concerts, and the extraordinary length of the programmes. 'I can stand a concert for an hour,' he added, 'but after an hour and a half my attention begins to wander. If anybody had the courage to advertise a concert that would not last more than an hour, I think he would get an enormous number of people there.' Mr. Shaw admitted that some of his anticipations did not work out satisfactorily. He failed, for instance, to meet the difficulty of the dearth of male members of choirs by stipulating that two new women members should introduce one man.

Reasons why choral singing had declined were given by Mr. Alan J. Kirby in a lecture at South Croydon. Choral societies, he said, had not moved with the times. They had allowed others to provide more sparkling entertainments. He thought that the next few years would see a revival in the popularity of choral-singing; indeed, revival of enthusiasm among choral singers had started already. In church choirs of all denominations the standard was deplorable in ineffectiveness. It was necessary for singers to feel the emotions they were endeavouring to portray, and not with some trick of tone convey it only with their mouths. Another reason why choral singing was unpopular in many instances was because choirs would take up a new work, with about four rehearsals, in a feverish rush to get the singers note-perfect, but the words were left to take care of themselves. Amongst other aspects of choral singing, Mr. Kirby gave his idea of the correct proportion of parts in a choir of twenty-five voices, viz., sopranos, eight; contraltos, seven; tenors, four; basses, six.

EASY PIANOFORTE DUETS

Here are some examples worth the attention of teachers: 'Comrades at the keyboard,' by Stuart Young, six pieces, both parts easy, and written with some special technical point in view (Gould & Bolttler, 2*s.*); 'Tunes for Two,' by Arthur Kingsley—four, easy, with the primo part slightly the more difficult (Keith, Prowse, 2*s.*); 'Wayside Tunes,' by E. Percival Driver—three, moderately easy, with good practice in dividing passages between the hands (International Music Co., 2*s.*); 'A Little Song' and 'Early Morning,' by Maurice Pesse, primo part in octaves for pupil, secondo moderately difficult for teacher (Keith, Prowse, 2*s.* each); 'Dignity and Impudence,' by Alec Rowley, five pieces with very simple part on one stave for second player, and an interesting but not very difficult part for primo (Oxford University Press, 2*s.* 6*d.*); 'Four Little Duets,' by Felix Swinstead, charming miniatures, both parts easy to moderately so (Oxford University Press, in pairs, 1*s.* 6*d.* each); 'The Realm of Youth,' by Colin Taylor, four capital treatments of nursery-rhyme tunes calling for good players (Oxford University Press, in two books, each 2*s.* 6*d.*).

NOTES ON AN AMERICAN LECTURE TOUR

By Ernest Fowles

AMERICAN AUDIENCES

A very natural doubt must assail any musician who goes to a great country like the United States for the express purpose of carrying to its people a message such as the one I bear. There are differences of outlook, of idiom, if not often of actual speech. It was, therefore, with mixed feelings that I faced my first audience at the New York University, an audience which consisted of some hundreds of students. Confidence came in a very few minutes. This audience was a listening audience. So much was evident from the attitude of the members and their obvious atmosphere of detachment. The subject, 'Idioms of Modern Music,' was not an easy one. Many an English audience would have been bored. But not this audience! And perhaps the greatest proof of their discipline in listening was their manner of taking notes. They wasted no time in desultory or extensive scribbling. Trained, apparently, to remember the substance of discourses, it was clear that they wrote only the headings of the lecture.

Another experience befell me a day or two later. A concert of modern music was given by the League of Composers. It included the works of one or two ultra-modernists and of others, perhaps less extreme, though 20th-century to the core. The concert drew a very large audience. In fact, as far as I could see, there were no vacant seats. A start was made with an abstruse though highly interesting Quintet for pianoforte and strings by Emerson Whithorne, played by Harold Bauer and four eminently capable string artists. It is a temptation to dwell upon this work as well as upon the fine manner of its interpretation, but it is rather of the audience that I would think. The Quintet was merely one item of five, any one of which would severely tax the concentrative powers of trained musicians. How would this large representative audience of the musical side of America stand the test?

To say that I was surprised would seem to belittle the intelligence and conduct of our brethren of the United States. But I have observed English audiences under similar conditions; and, to speak frankly, this particular audience had nothing to learn in the way of concentrative energy and manifest interest in the music. It was a pattern audience, and one which must have played an unconscious part by inspiring the artists in their extremely erudite task.

The same careful heed to the necessities and proprieties of the concert room was equally evident at a pianoforte recital given by Pauline Danforth—a pupil, by the way, of Matthay and Bruce Simonds, and an altogether admirable young player.

In fact, though it would be going too far to take audiences in general as a proof of vitality in art, or the reverse, it is at all events a sign of healthy life; and I find myself asking if it would be possible in London to get three such audiences equally ready and willing to give heed to the message of music.

MUSIC COMPETITION FESTIVALS

The Music Competition—or, as they prefer to call it here, Contest Festival—has found a real lodgment in New York. The whole movement is in the hands of a very experienced lady, to wit, Miss Isabel Lowden. After a long chat with this charming and enthusiastic 'director,' I emerged from the great Knickerbocker Building refreshed by the thought that our brethren across the seas are gaining confidence in their overwhelming task.

For the magnitude of this New York Festival, now in its sixth year, is appalling. In this great city separate competitions are assigned to forty-eight districts, a number presently to be increased to fifty-four. The choice of districts is necessarily dominated by school centres, with many obvious and happy advantages.

The conduct of the Festival is somewhat different from the plan pursued in the British Isles. The district competitions automatically qualify for entry into further and more centralised final rounds. The groups of finalists thus formed have then to compete afresh, and this procedure brings into all the competitions a progressive element which keeps the interest alive as the candidates proceed from step to step. The whole scheme is well thought out, and, I doubt not, securely and discreetly managed.

As would naturally be expected, the syllabus of the New York Music Week Association differs in some respects from that usually issued for British contests. Chief among the differences is a rather stringent set of rules for the control of the judges. In our country, such rules would be unnecessary, if only for the reason that no judge worthy of the name would dream of violating the very elementary principles involved. Here, however, they would seem to be needed for the protection of the judges from misunderstandings and prejudices.

In all probability—and here I speak frankly and with no experience of the actual working of an American Festival—the Americans as a body have yet to grasp the sporting side of the Festival movement as it is viewed by the English. That they will do so is perfectly evident to a dispassionate and sympathetic observer. Ten minutes in Miss Lowden's office are sufficient to dispel any doubts in that direction. Moreover, a few nights ago I was a guest at a gathering of distinguished educationists. Questions were showered upon me; and in nearly every case these bore upon Competition Festivals and the part they were playing in the music of my country.

Yes; America is very much alive to the need for carrying on the competitive movement. Indeed, it would not be surprising to hear that the example of the New York Music Week Association had been followed in every urban and provincial centre of the whole great country. The more I see of New York and its musical enthusiasts, the more am I convinced of its potentialities in every healthy development that affects the art of music.

MUSIC AND CHILDREN

On a recent Saturday morning I went down-town to Carnegie Hall. There I had the good fortune to listen to Walter Damrosch while, with a full orchestra before him, he discoursed to children upon instruments of percussion. It was an unforgettable experience. From my seat it appeared that the four or five balconies were full. It is certain that no seats on the ground floor were unoccupied.

Damrosch has a very delightful way with the young people. In an easy conversational manner he induced members of the orchestra to come to the front and illustrate the special sound-features of their individual instruments. If the truth must be told, I was at least as much interested as the children—and their interest was obvious and decisive.

In fact, the close attention with which the children followed the remarks and listened to the illustrations proved the excellence of the training in conduct afforded by the elementary schools of New York. No disparagement of our own school life is intended, but there can be no question that the average New York child understands the difference between the times of study and of play better than the youngster of the Old Country. The New Yorker loves noise, and flaunts his love far and wide; but he has an equal instinct for silence, and uses it to the full when he knows it to be imperatively necessary.

So now I know how this differentiation has come about. It is a habit gathered from the schools. Naturally, once it is formed, the habit is carried into the atmospheres which call for its exercise: those of the church, the lecture room, the concert hall and theatre. That is the reason why such perfect attention was accorded to the lecture mentioned above, and why the children listened to Damrosch with uplifted faces and in an ideal quiet.

But extremes must always meet—especially in America. A moment after the concert the youngsters were resolved into as many units of undiluted noise. But they had earned it! Even I wanted to shout with them. Damrosch had made me throw back the years and, once more, think with a child's thoughts and see with a child's vision.

It was, as I have said, an unforgettable experience.

CLEVELAND AND THE TEACHERS' CONVENTION

A night in the train and a run of some six hundred miles brought me to the city of Cleveland, an agglomeration of nigh upon a million people. My previous intercourse with musicians in New York had prepared me to expect much in the cities far afield, but to speak frankly, I did not anticipate what I actually found at Cleveland. In the first place, the good fortune befel me to spend an afternoon with two of the most live musicians I have ever met. Arthur Shepherd and Beryl Rubinstein are composers of keen vision. Shepherd played me his Pianoforte Sonata, a thoughtful and logical work cast in moderately modern idiom; Rubinstein played some children's music of a kind which shows that, in the preparation of elementary music, the minds of musicians, here as in England, have turned from the conventional and humdrum to the production of simple and beautiful art.

My third experience relates to the Convention of the American Music Teachers' National Association, at which I was honoured to be the guest-speaker at the banquet. Some hundreds of musicians foregathered from various centres, many coming immense distances, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of that Association. Of the president, William Arms Fisher, it is needless to speak. His work and breadth of culture are equally recognised in England and America. The topics discussed during the meeting were instructive, varied, and exhilarating. Of my own part, I should naturally wish to say but little. My first duty was to present a message of greeting from our newly-constituted Incorporated Society of Musicians to the Music Teachers' National Association of America. The document, signed by Dr. Adrian Boult, was printed for me by the Oxford University Press, and copies were available for every member of the Convention. Approaching the president, I grasped his hand and reminded him of the need for brotherhood between the two great nations, and that the language of music was one of the strongest influences in helping forward so beneficent a conception. Then followed a brief résumé of the conditions pertaining to music teachers in the British Isles, comparisons being ultimately drawn between their respective positions in the two continents concerned.

The contributions of Mrs. Clarke, a lady known throughout the States for her educational work, and of Madame Samaroff, a noted pianist of high intellectual attainments, completed what was to me a most valuable and uplifting experience.

It remains only to repeat and to emphasise the fact that this was the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Association. Can any other country show a record like this? Quality of service is, I know, not of necessity complementary to length of days; but beyond all doubt, the spirit at this meeting pointed to the consciousness of a background furnished by fifty years of vigorous life.

BLOCH'S 'AMERICA'

First, imagine an auditorium which reaches from the floor almost to the ceiling in rows upon rows of seats, so that if you mount to the very top the stage seems too far away for contact with music. You will then have a very fair idea of the Masonic Hall of Cleveland, Ohio.

Next, imagine this huge building filled with an audience sitting so quietly that the utmost pianissimo of a single instrument comes to you clearly, and you have a good idea of the acoustical properties of the hall. So, when the opportunity came to hear Ernest Bloch's new epic rhapsody played in this hall on two separate occasions, I embraced both with eagerness.

The Cleveland Orchestra is conducted by Nikolai Sokoloff, and rehearsals are evidently as frequent as they are thorough and successful.

'America' is a big, ambitious work, that follows the fortunes of this great country from the earliest settlements of the Pilgrim Fathers to its most modern phases of noise and jazz—a formidable programme. The nature of the work requires the co-operation of much folk-music, and the ingenuity with which this is worked into the texture is perhaps the outstanding feature of the whole. Many of these tunes are familiar on both sides of the Atlantic. The contrapuntal treatment, for instance, of 'Pop goes the weasel' and ''Way down the Swanee River' is masterly, and, in the circumstances attending the conception of the work, curiously impressive.

I left the hall with a feeling in my mind that we are on the threshold of an age in which we and our brethren here will, as they themselves say, go fifty-fifty. Formerly, art illumination sprang wholly from the east, and travelled westwards to this great continent. Presently, we shall find a criss-cross passing of sentiment, east and west mingling in an ever-increasing flow.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' Column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

L. B.—'The Pocket Sing-Song Book' (Novello, 1*s.* 6*d.*) contains an excellent Preface, full of practical advice on the conducting of community-singing. With this, plus your knowledge of music, and some natural gift of leadership, you ought to have no difficulty. You say you are in a college choir, but that you are not taught how to breathe or produce your voice properly. We suggest that you and some of your fellow-choristers begin to ask your trainer a few awkward questions. At present you are not getting your money's worth.

W. L. I.—Our remarks about 'Rimington' and other hymn-tunes lead you to ask, 'What constitutes a good tune?' As you claim to have written more than a thousand hymn-tunes we don't feel we can tell you much! However, we hope you will agree that the first requirement in a good tune is that it should be able to stand on its own feet; in other words, it should be so tuney that it needs no harmony to help out its life and interest. Nevertheless, for æsthetic and practical reasons, harmony is a desirable addition. It should be fitting, and good of its kind. If it is clumsily written or contains too many chords, it will clog the wings of the tune; if it is sugary or sentimental or over-chromatic the tune will be enervated. Nor should the harmony be fussy, with too many passing-notes. In short, we may say that a composer shows his invention in writing a tune, and his taste and musicianship in harmonizing it. (2.) We are unable to give you even a rough estimate of the cost of publishing a thousand tunes. A preponderance of S.M. or of such metres as six 10's would obviously make a difference of many pounds.

Oboe.—We are interested to hear of your son's oboe-playing. Here are a few works he might well add to his already good repertory: 'Alla Gitana,' Dukas; 'Andante pastorale' (for oboe and organ), Rheinberger; Pièce, Fauré; Pièce, Pierné; Three Pieces, Bach-Gillet; Three Romances, Op. 94, Schumann; 'Tarantelle,' Raff; Fantaisie, Op. 31, d'Indy. There are also twenty-one Sonatas by Handel in an edition by Max Seiffert for flute, oboe, or violin, with pianoforte. For your chamber music party with oboe: Quartet in F, No. 30 (K. 370), for oboe, violin, viola, and 'cello, Mozart; Variations, Op. 102, for oboe and string quartet, Hümmel, Op. 102; Concerto in C minor for oboe, string quartet, and pianoforte, Marcello. All these may be had from Novello.

Ciryl Edin.—(1.) Not many publishers, we imagine, buy 'lyrics.' Anyhow, we know of no publishers who lay themselves out for that kind of transaction, though they may do so in special cases. Your best plan would be to write to publishers of the type of song you have in mind, and offer them your song-words. (2.) We have no knowledge of the song-publishing society whose advertisement you quote. As you say, their offer seems almost too philanthropic. Write for a prospectus, by all means, but don't undertake to purchase quantities of your song when published. As a rule, the undertaking to set words to music and publish them 'free of charge' is a snare. The author has to buy a stack of copies, and he is usually the only customer. So part with no money. There are so many sharks lying in wait for just such folk as you that we utter a warning.

J. R.—You have been holding agitated debate on these points: (1.) 'Does a real artist enjoy other artists' performances, and go out of his way to hear them?' (2.) 'Do they merely go to learn something, if possible?' (3.) 'If they do not enjoy the performances of others, are they unmusical?' In the case of 'a real artist' who is also free from jealousy the answer to (1) and (2) is 'Yes.' (But why 'merely' to learn? The real artist is always bursting to learn.) As to (3), inability to enjoy the performance of others shows a defect on the personal side, but not on the musical—except in so far as all defects of personality adversely influence a musician's work.

E. F. G.—(1.) The only definite thing that can be said about Beethoven's religion is that it was of an indefinite order. There was a good deal of it, and it was drawn from a variety of sources. (2.) Certainly aural training will help sight-reading, especially the vocal kind. (3.) In theory, sonatas are absolute music, but so many have been written to a programme that the classification won't stand. You ask why Beethoven gave such titles as 'Moonlight' to his sonatas. He didn't. The titles were in most cases added by publishers and others. Only two of Beethoven's thirty-two Pianoforte Sonatas were labelled by the composer—the 'Pathetic' and 'Farewell.'

Curious.—(1.) The printing of the alto voice-part in the treble clef an octave higher than sung was no doubt a first result of the dropping of the alto clef. The treble clef was substituted, and the part written an octave above pitch in order to avoid leger lines. Later, no doubt, it was found that the leger lines were less of a nuisance than a notation that gave so false an idea of pitch. The history of notation contains many anomalies of the kind, especially in orchestral music. (2.) Flegler's song, 'Le Cor,' may be had from Novello. State whether you want English or French words.

Diapason.—Without knowing the capabilities of your boys we cannot recommend a cantata or operetta. We are asking Messrs. Novello to send you a list of likely works. From the full particulars given therein you should be able to choose a few to be sent on approval for a final choice. We think the opera you name would be rather too difficult; but send for a copy and judge for yourself.

W. D.—The musical profession is so over-crowded and hard hit in other ways that we hesitate to advise anybody to enter it. Go ahead with your organ work with a view to making it a spare-time job or a hobby. You will then be ready to take advantage of any chance that occurs of taking up music as a full professional.

A. A.—We do not think your pianoforte piece is worth publishing. Sorry! Experienced composers with something to say have a difficulty in getting their works published. You are obviously inexperienced, and have little to say. But this doesn't mean that you need give up composing. Regard it as a delightful hobby—and a purely private concern.

J. H. R.—Your Handel volume certainly seems to agree with that described by F. G. Edwards in the Musical Times of November, 1902. We suggest that you write to Mr. William C. Smith, at the British Museum, and ask him to allow you to send him the book for inspection.

H. G. K.—The Variations on the Austrian Hymn are in Haydn's String Quartet in C, Op. 76, No. 3. The Quartet may be had in the Vienna Philharmonia Miniature Scores edition (1s.). This series is excellent in every way. Send to Messrs. Hawkes, Denman Street, W.1, for a list.

H. A. K.—You may obtain Godowsky's pianoforte music and Ernest Schelling's 'Nocturne à Raguze' from Novello's. The two pieces by Chassins, 'Rush Hour in Hong Kong' and 'Flirtations in a Chinese Garden,' are published by Augener.

H. S.—For the Grave in Bach's Organ Fantasia in G we prefer minim = 60 to crotchet = 60. But so much depends on the organ and the building that the actual pace may be anything between the two. Aim at keeping the feeling of two in a bar, anyway.

Barnstaple.—Most of the classical pianoforte concertos can be had with orchestral part arranged for a second keyboard. The latter can be adapted to the organ. Franck's Symphonic Variations are very effective treated in this way.

Musico.—(1.) We have no views as to the relative status of the University degrees you mention—and if we had we wouldn't publish them. (2.) Residence is necessary at Cambridge, but not at Oxford.

A. O.—If you are possessed of good average feeling for music, you certainly ought to be able to realise your ambition, and within a year or so play the double-bass in simple orchestral music.

Regular Reader (Ceylon).—We understand that owing to the forthcoming General Election the Handel Festival, due this year, is postponed until next.

Musicus.—We cannot trace the song beginning with the line, 'The shadows were falling from Heaven's great throne.'

Mr. W. H. Davies kindly writes suggesting that 'W. J. T.,' who inquired last month for a book on adding a melody to an unfigured bass, will be helped by Buck's 'Unfigured Harmony.' We know this book, but didn't suggest it because the request was for a book dealing specially with melodies.

Church and Organ Music

THE GREGORIAN ASSOCIATION

That plainchant can never be popular until the people learn to sing it was the note struck at the annual meeting of the Gregorian Association held at Syon College, Embankment, E.C., on Tuesday evening, January 29.

The Rev. C. E. R. de Copinger presided over an excellent attendance. The meeting having re-elected the officers, council, and executive committee, settled down to a discussion of the important question of how to teach plainchant popularly.

Mr. Martin Shaw opened with the opinion that, as regards the Psalms, they should concentrate on few—that is from fifteen to twenty—and should avoid the more elaborate endings to the tones; for the Mass, they should restrict themselves to two or three simple settings; as to methods of teaching, he advocated congregational practices without the organ or choir, the teacher to sing the example and let the people repeat it after him.

Capt. Francis Burgess, Musical Director of the Association, followed, endorsing much of the foregoing. He thought they should rely not so much on specialists as on the keen amateur. The good teacher is he who links on what he is teaching to what is already in the minds of his pupils. Hence, as so many people had been early accustomed to the Tonic Sol-fa system, they might consider how it could be used in the popular teaching of plainchant.

Mr. H. A. Hawkins, of Hurstpierpoint College, gave of his valuable experience, saying that he had found that a good chanter singing the alternate verses of the Psalms as they should be sung, almost inevitably inspired the rest to sing the other verses correctly and even artistically. He had achieved fine effects at Mass by having a large unison choir with a smaller harmony choir leading and answering.

Other speakers included the Rev. H. Kynaston Hudson, and Mr. Darwen Fox, the latter suggesting as a method of teaching that the choir or people read the Psalm together first, so that the correct rhythm might be attained, next reciting it on one note so as to show that time did not affect the dynamics of the reading, and finally introducing the inflexions. Mr. Martin Shaw summed up, and expressed the hope that the Musical Director would find an opportunity of giving a blackboard demonstration of the application of Tonic Sol-fa to plainsong; and a vote of thanks to the chairman closed a very fruitful meeting.

C. L. T. Beeching.

Dr. Alfred Hollins gave his annual organ and pianoforte recital at Clapton Park Congregational Church, in connection with the Clapton Park Literary Society, on February 5. His organ solos were Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in C minor (a fine work that should be more often heard at recitals), his own 'Siciliano and Bourrée,' and the Toccata from Widor's fifth Symphony. As pianist, Dr. Hollins was heard in the 'Emperor' Concerto and Franck's Symphonic Variations, the orchestral part in these works being played on the organ by Mr. H. L. Balfour. Miss Dora Labbette sang songs by Spohr, Reger, Stanford, and Donald Ford. Dr. Hollins also gave recitals at Southfields, Westcliff-on-Sea, Tollington Park, and at Upper Clapton, the chief works in his programmes being Bach's Toccata in F, Prelude and Fugue in D, and the 'Great' G minor Fugue, Mendelssohn's first Sonata, Franck's Pastorale, his own Concert Overtures Nos. 1 and 2, &c.

The All Saints' (Bradford) Bach Choir gave its second concert of the season on February 5, with a miscellaneous programme of which the cantata 'O Light Everlasting' was the chief item. Other choral works were Parry's 'There is an old belief,' Charles Wood's 'Glory and honour,' and Bantock's 'They that go down.' Mr. Charles Stott conducted.

MR. CUNNINGHAM IN THE U.S.A.

Our readers will hear with pleasure that Mr. G. D. Cunningham's debut in New York was a brilliant success. His first recital was at the Wanamaker Auditorium, on January 18, the programme opening with Parry's Fantasia and Fugue in G, and including the Reubke Sonata, the 'Wedge' Prelude and Fugue, Franck's Prelude, Fugue, and Variation, and the Finale of Widor's seventh Symphony, with a Wesley Air and Gavotte, Gigout's Scherzo in E, and MacDowell's 'A.D. 1620' for relief. A formidable programme, this. Speaking of the Reubke work, The Diapason describes it as 'the high-light of the programme,' and adds: 'To play such a stupendous work with a thorough exposition of its great descriptive powers, and from memory, as Mr. Cunningham did, is the work of a superior artist.'

As evidence of 'the deep impression made by the famous Englishman,' The Diapason quotes the following from the report of Noel Strauss, the Evening World critic:

> 'A serious and imaginative master of his instrument was introduced to American audiences yesterday in G. D. Cunningham. Although possessing notable technical command of manuals and pedalboard, he shunned display for its own sake. His earnestness of purpose was further exemplified by the avoidance of fancy registrations. What fascination he could impart through this purity of tint was instanced by the Wesley pieces. Few organists can mould a melody with the flexibility and deftness which Mr. Cunningham displayed; the phrases were as sensitively outlined as if they were being produced on a violin. His most amazing feats of bravura were to be found in his superlative rendition of Reubke's Sonata, and here the organist's fine dramatic power and descriptive sense had full play—gifts which were to the fore also in MacDowell's "A.D. 1620."'

Other New York critics speak of Mr. Cunningham's 'unusual technical resources,' 'unerring taste,' 'remarkable memory and fine musicianship,' &c.—all of which we in England have long recognised, and which it is good to see appreciated across the water. One of the most famous of American recitalists, writing to us personally, says, 'We are very much enjoying Mr. Cunningham's visit, both artistically and personally. The high-water mark of his playing has, I think, been the great Reger composition, Fantasia and Fugue on "B A C H," although I derived special pleasure from the Parry G major Fugue.' By the way, it is good to see The Diapason describing this Parry work as 'splendid.' We hope that this U.S.A. tour by Mr. Cunningham will lead to trips by other representative English players, with the inevitable result of a better knowledge and appreciation of English organ-playing and organ music. We believe that, so far, Dr. Hollins and Mr. Cunningham are the only two British organists of standing who have toured the States.

LONDON SOCIETY OF ORGANISTS

At the annual general meeting the following new members were elected to the Council to take the place of those retiring under the rules: Messrs. F. W. Belchamber, R. Goss-Custard, R. A. Greir, R. Walker Robson, C. H. Trevor, and John E. West. The vacancy created by the resignation of Mr. Albert Orton was filled by the election of Mr. Theodore Walrond, and the hon. treasurer, Mr. J. Percy Baker, and the hon. secretary, Dr. J. Warriner, were re-elected. The president for 1929 is Mr. G. Thalben Ball, organist of the Temple Church.

Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' was sung at St. John's Church, Lowestoft, on February 8, by the combined choirs of St. John's and St. Edmund's, Kessingland. Mr. C. R. J. Coleman conducted, and the accompaniments were played on the organ and pianoforte by Mr. Ernest Tuttle and Mr. Ben Curtis.

Clarke-Whitfeld's oratorio, 'The Crucifixion and the Resurrection,' was performed at Hereford Cathedral in 1822 and 1825, but there seems to be no evidence of its having been heard since. It will be revived on March 27, at 8 p.m., when a performance will be given at St. Mary's Church, Abbey Road, Kilburn. No doubt many church-choir folk, remembering that old favourite 'In Jewry is God known,' will make a point of being present. Concerning the oratorio, we read in Bumpus's 'History of English Cathedral Music' that it was performed at Hereford Cathedral 'with universal approbation,' at the Hereford Triennial Meeting, in 1822 and 1825, and excited additional interest from the publicity of the circumstance of its having been composed during the agonised feelings of the author for the loss of his eldest son, an amiable young man, midshipman on board H.M.S. York (Captain Mitford), who perished, with the whole crew, December 24, 1808.

At Christ Church, Crouch End, special music is sung after evensong on one Sunday in the month, the sermon being dropped on that occasion. The performance is preceded by an explanatory talk by Dr. Walker Robson, the music director at Christ Church. The experiment has a good deal to be said for it. Above all, it provided a solution in cases where it is desired that the actual service music shall be simple. A monthly choir recital gives the singers plenty of interesting work, and the performances being held after the service, a wide selection is possible. Moreover, members of the congregation who have no use for music needn't listen to it. On January 20 the choir sang Parry's 'The Glories of our Blood and State.'

At an organ recital given by Mr. Ronald Bennett at Holy Trinity Church, Barnstaple, on February 12, a much-appreciated feature was a performance of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, with Miss Connie Tall as soloist, Mr. Bennett playing the orchestral part on the organ. Vocal solos (Holst, Handel, &c.) by Miss Edith Mills, pianoforte solos (Chopin and York Bowen), and standard organ works, made up a good scheme.

The Annual Service in connection with Barclay's Bank was held at St. Michael's, Cornhill, on February 14. The Barclay's Bank Male-Voice Choir sang Bach's cantata, 'O walk the heavenly way' (adapted for male voices), Palestrina's 'Come, let us worship,' and Charles Wood's Magnificat for double three-part male chorus. Mr. Herbert Pierce conducted, and Dr. Harold Darke played the organ.

A selection from Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' was sung at Bermuda Cathedral on January 24 by the combined choirs of the Cathedral and Hamilton Wesley Church. There was a small but efficient string orchestra, and the solos were undertaken successfully by members of the choir. Mr. Henry T. Gilberthorpe conducted an excellent performance, in which Mr. Norman Parker did valuable work at the organ.

The Weybridge Choral Society performed Parts 1 and 2 of the Christmas Oratorio in the Parish Church, on January 22, Mr. C. Kenneth Turner accompanying on the organ. The soloists were Mesdames Goold and Darlington, and Messrs. Harold Knowlton and Arthur Frith.

The organ at Bath Street Primitive Methodist Church, Ilkeston, has been rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. E. Wragg, and was re-opened with recitals by Mr. Blyton Dobson.

The organ at Wesley Church, Plymouth, has been rebuilt by Messrs. Hele, and is now a three-manual of thirty-five stops. Mr. Gatty Sellars gave the opening recital.

Byrd's 'Great' Service was sung by the Liverpool Bach Choir at St. Luke's Church on February 5, conducted by Dr. James E. Wallace.

Mr. A. George has been presented with a wallet of Treasury notes to mark the completion of forty years' service as organist at Zion Congregational Church, Coedpaeth, Wrexham. He began his duties there when quite a small boy.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have just completed a new organ for St. Mary's Cathedral, Johannesburg—a three-manual (Choir and Solo played from one manual) of fifty-one stops and thirty-five pistons.

'Ten Orders of Worship from the Book of Congregational Worship,' with music by Walford Davies. [Patersons, paper, 2*s.*; cloth, 3*s.*]

There is much here that is of interest to Church musicians of all denominations. The book is the first part of a larger work designed as a musical companion to the book mentioned in the title. The 'Orders' are short offices, mainly on the lines of the Church of England Orders of Morning and Evening Prayer. Sir Walford Davies's music is admirably suited to its purpose, being diatonic, singable, free from regular barring, and always Church-like. Wisely, he makes liberal use of inflections and progressions that have been associated with Church worship for centuries; the amount of variety he achieves by these simple means is astonishing. The music is printed in both notations, and conveniently laid out. Sir Walford's Introductory Essay sets forth admirably the ideals to be aimed at in Church music, and advises practically how they may be achieved. These eleven pages should be read by all who have to do with the ordering of musical services. They might well survey their efforts in the light of the following passage:

> 'Perhaps it is more bearable in a concert-room that singers should give less than their best, and that when they give their best they should be applauded for it. But for Church musicians it is quite unbearable. In church they can never decently submit less than their best as a vehicle for the spirit of worship, and their best has quite failed if it is applauded. Does this sound too high? It is a bare statement of fact, and, in the editor's judgment, it is the one fact that must be faced in a new spirit with a new and untiring zeal on the part of the simple and devout musical worshippers who constitute the choir.'

Nearly all the troubles that beset Church music arise from the overlooking of the truism implied in the last sentence—that a choir should consist of simple and devout worshippers. They should also be singers—but only 'also,' not as a prime consideration. What a long way Church musicians have travelled from this simple but undeniable first principle! Can they get back to it?

Letters to the Editor

'SCHUBERTIANA'

Sir,—In the interests of accuracy, permit me to call attention to a discrepancy in the Schubert article in the new 'Grove' which seems to have escaped notice hitherto. It concerns the portraits of the composer. At p. 624: '2. A very characteristic half-length . . . by A. W. Rieder . . . engraved by Passini, and we here give the head, from a photograph expressly taken from the original (Plate LXXI.).' On Plate LXXI. the portrait is said to be 'from a lithograph by Kriehuber.'—Yours, &c., Edward H. Ezard.

CHORAL-SINGING AND THE MICROPHONE

Sir,—The peculiar manner in which the choir of All Saints', Margaret Street, presented the music broadcast by them under Dr. Nicholson certainly taught us what to avoid. 'Ariel' is inclined to blame the transmission because other choirs have not 'come over' well. It is a pity that he did not listen-in on this particular occasion, because, although I have had experience of the way in which the B.B.C. treats a choir (and from this point of view hold no brief for it), I do not think the transmission could have caused the jerkiness that we got on this occasion.

I have sung for a number of years in a choir alongside one of the members of the choir of All Saints', and for some time past have noticed that he sings with a 'punch' or an aspirate on every note in exactly the same manner as suggested by 'A.R.C.O.' At first I thought it was a little humour on the part of my fellow-chorister, but have since come to the conclusion that it was due to some peculiar training. This opinion was confirmed by the broadcast on January 6.—Yours, &c., Choirmaster.

Sir,—A friend has drawn my attention to the letter by 'A.R.C.O.' in the February issue of the Musical Times with reference to the broadcast lecture by Dr. Nicholson, illustrated by the choir of All Saints'.

I have attended All Saints' Church very many times, and have invariably noticed and commented on the fact that the choir sang, 'Come, Ho-holy Go-host,' and so on; so it would seem that the fault does not lie with the broadcast. In fact, before I put my headphones on I said, 'I wonder if All Saints' choir still sing "A-ha-men."'

If 'A.R.C.O.' will pay a visit to All Saints', I think he will confirm my observation, and will probably notice one or two other small faults of diction.—Yours, &c., A.R.C.M.

Sir,—In fairness to Dr. Nicholson, to the choir of All Saints', Margaret Street, and to the B.B.C., I should like to say that my three-valve set reproduced the lecture and illustrations on January 6 very faithfully, and although I am not easily pleased with choirs, I listened throughout the proceedings with real enjoyment. 'A.R.C.O.' may therefore take it for granted that there was something amiss with his wireless set on that occasion.

He is quite right, however, with regard to the staccato effect of the singers whenever two or more notes were to be sung to one syllable, and that was certainly very odd in such a reputable choir. But, apart from this objectionable trait, Dr. Nicholson is to be warmly congratulated on having given his worthy venture an admirable start. I find that it is not always easy (or even possible) to tune in effectively for chorus singing; but in this particular instance I was fortunate enough to hear the music pretty much as it must have sounded in the studio.—Yours, &c.,

Altrincham, Cheshire. Christie Green.

'THE MESSIAH'

Sir,—Will you allow me to correct an unfortunate slip in my letter in the February number? When referring to the discovery of Handel's original wind parts, I mentioned flutes. I should have said merely wind parts, as flutes were not among those included.

Perhaps the most characteristic trait of Handel's orchestration is the alternation of passages for small and large orchestras. Handel was evidently planning for big forces from the first.—Yours, &c.,

'Oakhurst,' Mount Park, Harrow-on-the-Hill. Hugh Gardner.

P.S.—A little attention to the score with its artistic alternations between large orchestra and small orchestra (con rip. and senza rip.), one of Handel's most characteristic devices of orchestration, will show that Handel was thinking in terms of the big battalions when he wrote his score; so that another of the arguments in favour of additional accompaniments disappears.

A BRAHMS-BEETHOVEN THEMATIC COINCIDENCE

Sir,—Facts are indeed stubborn things, and one of the hardest is the fact that what everybody says does not always prove to be the truth. However, let us see why everybody thinks that the opening of the Finale of Brahms's C minor Symphony recalls the corresponding place in Beethoven's Ninth.

First, the history of the illusion is most likely as follows: Brahms, who showed no desire to win people's good opinion, had given much offence by his first Pianoforte Concerto. Next, he had thoroughly upset people in his own country by his 'Requiem.' Moreover, he had most likely annoyed lots of his fellow men by his 'Dass sieht jeder Narr'—I have seen it ascribed to more than one occasion, so it was probably a habit with him. Now comes his C minor Symphony—his first, and also the first written since Beethoven which was worthy of comparison with that master. People were prepared to find fault with it, and so they hit on the opening major theme in the Finale and cried, 'Beethoven! Beethoven!' or words to that effect. The cry was heard in England, and taken up by critics who knew enough of Brahms's rather Handelian kind of originality—more in the spirit than the letter—to make the accusation look reasonable.

Secondly, the emotional situation of the Brahms theme has, as far as I know, been created only twice before—by Beethoven in his two minor Symphonies (the relation of the Finale of the C minor Symphony to the curious Scherzo is a similar piece of emotional drama to that of the Ninth, though not on such a large scale). But there the resemblance ends.

Of course the idea has gained so strong a hold that almost anyone who hears the Symphony of Brahms has probably heard of the analogy first; but judge the music absolutely on its own plane, and Brahms will be seen to have been for once in his life quite guiltless of even unconscious plagiarism; and, incidentally, he had the good luck to give us a much better tune than Beethoven's, though I grant willingly that Beethoven's failure is a greater thing than Brahms's success when the two complete works are considered.—Yours, &c.,

79, Crofton Road, S.E.5. H. V. Spanner.

TUNES FOR 'O VALIANT HEARTS'

Sir,—The complaint in your December 'Occasional Notes,' that J. S. Arkwright's fine hymn, 'O valiant hearts,' is commonly sung to a tune which is quite unworthy of it, must be echoed by those who appreciate the grandeur of the poem. At the thirteenth centenary of York Minster, in 1927, it was sung to Song 4, by Orlando Gibbons, No. 113 in the 'English Hymnal.' This tune was also adopted at the Ripon Diocesan Choir Festival, held last November, and sung with thrilling effect by nearly nine hundred voices, two verses being sung in faux-bourdon. Some might object that the tune is not likely to be popular, but the way it was sung by that great choir at Ripon, of which more than half the voices came from small village choirs, seems to refute such criticism.—Yours, &c.,

Goldsborough, Yorks. A. Hastings Kelk.

MUSIC IN THE CINEMA

Sir,—Mr. Sabaneev in his interesting and suggestive article on music in the cinema remarks, 'In my opinion the sphere of the typical, normal cinema has become too traditional, too infected with commercialism to allow of music's gaining for itself here a more important position than it now occupies . . . music is perpetually doomed to play a secondary part . . .,' &c. If the film itself is the primary object of interest, then the incidental music, whether specially composed for the film or not, should remain incidental; when the rôles are reversed and the film accompanies the music, we may, as Mr. Sabaneev suggests, obtain some interesting and valuable artistic results, but not unless the production is deliberately designed with that end in view. As things are at present, it seems to me a mistake to over-emphasise a purely subordinate feature.

As a matter of fact, the most appropriate accompanimental music that I have yet heard was during the special 'pre-release' run of Erich von Stroheim's production, 'Foolish Wives,' at the New Oxford Theatre a few years ago, when the musical director eschewed those feverish fortissimos favoured by cinema managers who imagine, apparently, that the orchestra is not earning its pay unless playing loudly the whole time, and maintained throughout the film a tonal level varying from pp to mf. The music (which, I believe, was composed during the production) thus achieved far more subtle and vivid results by means of suggestion than by crude attempts at illustration.

Furthermore, one wishes, for purely physical reasons, that those responsible for the various noises off-stage would realise that the most effective method of arresting one's attention during a dramatic climax is not by means of ear-splitting explosions, &c., but by dead silence—which, needless to say, must be carefully timed if its full value is to be obtained.

But music in the cinema is by no means confined to film accompaniment. In most modern cinemas the programmes have developed, or rather degenerated, into a variety entertainment, of which one of the principal items is the so-called musical interlude. Generally this consists of So-and-So's Symphonic Syncopated Orchestra playing a stupid succession of snippets entitled, 'Melodious Moments with Mendelssohn,' which, bad enough in itself, becomes intolerable when it proceeds to 'Chopiniana' and other acts of desecration.

Or, occasionally, one may hear a soprano, singing Gounod's perversion of the first Prelude from the '48,' aided and abetted by that ghastly contradiction in terms the cinema organ, the foundation tone of which is invariable, namely, Chinese Gong and Dyspeptic Goat.

In case I am accused of exaggeration, I append herewith a list (culled from the Daily Telegraph) of the sounds which may be produced from the instrument at the recently opened Regal Cinema at Marble Arch: glockenspiel, xylophone, celesta, vibraphone, sleigh bell, two independent sets of small chimes, side-drum, bass drum, tom-tom, triangle, cymbals, Chinese gong, wood block, tambourine, jingles, castanets, sand block, steamboat whistle, railway whistle, police whistle, thunder, surf, wind howl, rain, aeroplane, slap-on-the-face, Klaxon horn, motor horn, fire bell, telephone bell, bird whistle, horses' hooves, syren, whip crack, ratchet, crockery smash, pistol shot, cannon effect, hand-bell, anvil, and cock-crow.

All the above and even worse is due to the mistaken policy of trying to 'give the public what it wants'; in other words, playing down to the lowest common mental denominator.

I cannot believe that the taste of the average cinema audience is quite as bad as this, for these pathetic efforts to please rarely succeed in evoking really spontaneous applause. What is required at the present moment is plenty of good, wholesome light music of the type described by (I think) Percy Scholes as 'mezzo-brow'—that is, music which is tuneful, interesting, uncommonplace, but easy to listen to, and attractive both to untutored and sophisticated ears—as an example of this, almost anything of Edward German's or the Tchaikovsky of the 'Casse-Noisette.'

From this beginning I see no reason why it should be impossible to pass on to, say, a Bach Suite, which is bound to 'get across' by reason of its infectious rhythmic vitality.

In this way a dual purpose would be served; the public taste would be improved, and the concert-goer could, for once, hear decent music in decent surroundings for a third of the price demanded for a hard, cramped seat in a building closely resembling a mausoleum and in an atmosphere de-oxidised with unalloyed gloom . . . no need to mention names.—Yours, &c.,

Clinton Gray-Fisk.

'THE LARYNX AGAIN'

Sir,—From the number of communications, &c., I have received it appears to me that the letter headed 'The Larynx Again' has aroused some attention. If I am allowed to express my opinion I should say that the special idea contained in your correspondent's letter, i.e., that the larynx, and I presume the throat, should be consistently ignored in teaching and singing, constitutes a positive danger. I am aware that it has become fashionable of late to warn pupils of the danger of directing any thought to the throat, so that your correspondent is in fashionable company.

Yet there is one fatal flaw in such teaching, and that is the leaving completely out of account, in practice, the two great principles of 'cause' and 'effect.' If a singer consistently ignores the legitimate attention due to the vocal cords and the moveable resonators, he will run the risk of not placing the sound on the proper part of the roof of the mouth, or of not obtaining nasal resonance.

If proof is required, I shall be prepared to supply it in full detail. I consider that the letters on the larynx which have lately appeared were of the greatest practical value, where true voice-production and voice-building are concerned.—Yours, &c.,

H. Travers Adams.

Sir,—With reference to the letter on the subject of 'The Larynx Again' (p. 1121) of the December issue of the Musical Times, will you kindly allow me a little space for a few dissenting remarks, as certain postulates are highly pernicious in their effect on students who in many cases are ardently searching for truth. I wonder whether your correspondent would be surprised to learn that truly great singers, such as it has been the privilege of the writer to have as intimate friends, singers whose vocal mechanism is beyond the pale of criticism—such as the famous Antonio Cotogni, admittedly Italy's greatest baritone (master of Jean de Reske), to mention one of the past glories of the grand old school, and present ones such as Dinh Gilly, Pertile, Schipa, Inghilleri, Pampanini—all of whom studied for years to attain their present artistic status, never 'concentrate on their hard palate' or use 'the hard palate as a result of enlightened practice.' The vocal mechanism of really great singers is such that the much-loved and much-praised hard palate does not receive such flattering attention, such a monofocus concentration. How easy would vocal emission be for all if the 'vocalist's chief concern was concentration on the hard palate'! The science of vocal mechanics in which the larynx has pre-eminence embraces very much more than mere 'concentration on the hard palate,' which latter is the constant forward-production method which faddists, especially in England, have developed into a hybrid technique, and which, unfortunately for some very fine British voices and talent, has ruined more careers than it would be charitable to mention.

Your correspondent is right when he says that if a singer 'worries' about larynx or technique his interpretation falls to pieces. If he 'worries' about his mechanism he is not a singer yet, and should return to his studies till he has mastered his instrument.

Again, to say that 'the singer who knows his business must consistently ignore his larynx' is, to me, absurd; it is tantamount to telling the violinist or pianist to ignore his instrument and just sway to his interpretation. But there can be no really true and effective interpretation without a fine technique, which, although developed by long study into a quasi-automatism, must always be consciously directed and controlled (it is only fools who place implicit confidence in the subconscious). Yet with this difference: instrumentalists to-day have a definite technique all over the world, but vocalists, poor unfortunate creatures, are not trained on a definite technique, for none exists to-day anywhere. Instead, fads and methods galore reign supreme which are without foundation and are counterfeits of the old technique, merely obscured by colossal universal ignorance of facts and traditions which produced the highest results. The singer need not think in terms of muscles (arytenoids, cricoids, and, maybe, shriek-oids); such paraphernalia is useless and idiotic, but he must know the most intimate workings of his vocal cords, he must know every sensation they give from the lowest to the highest note on every vowel. The student and singer must learn to know and control cause, for then effect will look very much after itself. The great singers control cause, and control and guide effect. They do not trust their larynx to work automatically, and by larynx I mean particularly the vocal cords, because they know that part of their attention must necessarily be held on the instrument, on the live, palpitating principle which is vocal mechanism. To sing on effect while ignoring cause is indeed a lame, limping, one-sided idea, which courts trouble and gets it. The subject is too vast to pursue here, but please do not think I am attacking your correspondent, for I am sure he is quite sincere and conscientiously convinced of the truth of his assertions. No; I am attacking the system—that is, the devastating constant forward-production method so prevalent in England and so baneful in its effects, and oh! so poor in results.—Yours, &c., 43, Mowbray Road, N.W.6. E. Herbert-Cæsari.

BACH'S TOMB

Sir,—To those familiar with the dishonouring condition of Bach's resting-place in the Johanniskirche, Leipsic, it will bring relief to learn that the Bach-Gesellschaft has charged itself with the duty of embellishing the vault in which the sarcophagus stands. It is intended to complete the renovation in time for the Bachfest which is to be held at Leipsic in June. On financial and other grounds it is desirable that this act of homage, in the year that commemorates the bicentenary of the production of the 'Matthäuspassion,' shall be rendered as universally as possible. To that end the Bach-Gesellschaft makes a particular appeal for new members, and I would invite those who desire to respond to it to send their names and addresses, along with a ten-shilling Bank of England note, to the Geschäftstelle der Neuen Bach-Gesellschaft, Nürnberger Strasse 36, Leipsic.—Yours, &c.,

King's College, Old Aberdeen. C. Sanford Terry.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Lady violinist wishes to meet good pianist for mutual practice. Classical music.—R. V., 104, Ferme Park Road, Stroud Green, N.8.

Contralto (advanced) wishes to meet lady accompanist, for mutual practice. One wanting practice in sight-reading would suit. Monday or Thursday evenings. —Miss Chamberlain, c/o 15, Langham Place, W.1.

Lady violinist would like to meet pianist for mutual practice; or would join string trio or quartet.—F., 105, Roding Road, Clapton, E.5.

Lady pianist wishes to meet singer or instrumentalist, for mutual practice. Liverpool or Wallasey.—M. H., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (W.2 district) wishes to meet good violinist or 'cellist for mutual practice.—Pianist, c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (gentleman) wishes to meet advanced violinist for mutual practice of classical works. W. London. —H. M. A., c/o Musical Times.

Candidate for F.R.C.O. (July) wishes to meet another, for practice of ear-tests. London.—C. F. H., c/o Musical Times.

Sharps and Flats

'Sottish' Fantasia, Bruch.—Concert Programme.

'Tis very easy. I just spread my fingers over the right notes and then press them the right way.—Gieseking.

In theory I'm heart and soul in sympathy with the moderns. I just naturally am in sympathy with new things and the people who want to try new things in new ways. In music, though, the results are less agreeable than the theory. The idea of music shaking off fetters and striking out towards new dimensions seems entirely laudable. But the sounds that result! —Fannie Hurst.

I hate musicians of all kinds. They're always talking about opus this and opus that.—George Copeland (pianist).

At evening service the choir sang the Management and Nunc Dimittis to Clarke Whitfield's beautiful setting.—Derby Daily Telegraph.

I don't want to convey any message. I play what I like the way I like it, and the audience generally likes it too. And I don't give a whoop about leaving the world a better place when I die. And too much Beethoven never did anybody any good.—George Copeland.

'Evening Subject, "What is hell like?"

'Come and hear our new organ.'

Church notice.

Competition Festival Record

Chesterfield (January 24-26).—The children's day included a wide range of classes—vocal and instrumental, soloists, choirs, country and sword dancers. Blackwell Council School (Mr. L. Walton) won high praise, and the Mary Wakefield Memorial Medallion went to Clay Cross Girls' School. Sir Henry Coward distributed the prizes, which never consist of money.

Inter-Sectional Co-operative Contest.—This is the first competition jointly organized by co-operative societies in the Sheffield district. Choirs and quartet parties from the three sections—Midland, North-Western, and North-Eastern—were brought together. It is hoped to develop this idea into a National Co-operative Choir Festival to embrace the whole of the movement. In the mixed-voice choir class Mansfield and Sutton were first, Bolton and Long Eaton being second and third. Barrowford Male Choir stood first in its class, followed by Halifax and Long Eaton.

Mansfield.—The eleventh Festival promoted by the Education Department of the Mansfield Co-operative Society showed an increased entry. The challenge cup for children's choirs was won by Barrow Hill Primitives, with Mansfield Wesleyan Reform and Kirkby Co-operative equal seconds.

'Mrs. Sunderland' Competition.—This, one of the oldest Festivals, ran for four days at Huddersfield. There was a crowded children's day. The girl soloists pleased better than the boys. Marsden Council School (Mr. S. B. Haycock) took the first place among choirs on the first day. The Samuel Firth shield for elementary schools was won by Leeds Green Lane. Miss Jessie Hewitson took first prizes both in an instrumental competition and in the girls' solo class. In the male-voice quartet class Sheffield Orpheus gained its sixth successive win in open competitions. Colne Valley (Mr. G. E. Stead) won the male-voice choir contest, and Golcar Baptists (also conducted by Mr. Stead) won in the mixed class, Huddersfield Vocal Union (Mr. Fletcher Sykes) being only a couple of marks behind. The Rose Bowl for soloists was won by Norman Crabtree, of Keighley.

Renfrewshire. (January 25-February 2).—The eleventh Renfrewshire Festival ran for ten days at Greenock, and was well supported by both competitors and public. Principal awards: Men's Choirs — Greenock Male-Voice Choir; Women's Choirs—Barrhead Co-operative Choir; Mixed Choirs—Greenock Festival Choir; Church Choirs—Radnor Park U.F. Church Choir, Clydebank; Junior Choirs—Dumbarton Equitable Co-operative Junior Choir; School Choirs (Premier)—Greenock High School; (Post-qualifying)—Greenock High School; (Senior)—Holmscroft School, Greenock; (Junior)—Craigieknowes School, Greenock; (Infants)—Hillend School, Greenock; Boys' Choirs—St. Mary's School, Greenock; Scottish Country Dancing (Senior)—Clutha Team, Greenock; (Junior)—Renfrew Brownie Pack; Vocal Solos (General)—Joseph C. Gardiner, Paisley; (Scots Song)—David M'Kerral, Southend, Kintyre.

COMING FESTIVALS

Redhill, Reigate, and District.—The fourth Festival takes place on March 13 and 16. An unusual feature is that almost all the test-pieces are from one work—Eric Gritton's cantata 'The Holy Child,' which will be performed complete once during the Festival, and again at the prize distribution. Secretary—Miss Donkin, Upmeads, Reigate.

Welwyn Garden City.—The first Eisteddfod is announced for March 22, 23, and 25. There are sections for music, elocution, literature, general knowledge, photography, arts and crafts, cookery, and needlework. Most of the prizes consist of silver and bronze medals. No money is given. Entries are to be in before March 5, to Mr. E. Mein, 3, Elmwood, Welwyn Garden City, Herts.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Two concerts of more than usual interest have taken place during the last month, on January 28, in Duke's Hall. Rowland Dyson, who comes from Cleckheaton, played the first movement of Blättermann's Trumpet Concertino, with organ accompaniment by Douglas Hawkridge. It was an exceptionally good performance, the tone being firm and finely controlled. The Finale of Louis Vierne's Organ Symphony No. 1, Op. 14, was well played by E. Power Biggs, and Joan Allen, a Bristol girl, is to be congratulated for her tone and general style in Bach's 'Chaconne' for unaccompanied violin. The Aria from 'Elijah,' 'Hear ye, Israel,' was sung by Jean Campbell-Kemp, from Glasgow. Vocally and dramatically it was an interpretation quite out of the common.

On February 11, Arnold Bax's Quintet for oboe and strings was the main feature of the chamber concert. This interesting work is characteristic of the composer, and the middle movement—lento espressivo—is wistfully Irish in its idiom. It was played by Helen Gaskell and a male string quartet, and exceedingly well done.

A surprisingly good performance of 'The Bell Song,' from 'Lakmé,' was given by Joan Coxon. Whatever the song may be worth musically, this young singer, a native of Southsea, 'flung off' the coloratura effects with astonishing facility. I was much impressed by May Turtle's conception of two Lieder by Richard Strauss; there was more than mere singing in her performance. The standard of this concert was well above the average.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, February 5 and 6, opera performances took place in the Duke's Rehearsal Theatre, the works being Debussy's 'L'Enfant Prodigue' and Pergolesi's 'La Serva Padrona.' Both were produced, rehearsed, and staged by the students of the Opera Class, and Winifred Baines, as producer and stage-manager, deserves hearty congratulations. Despite the doubting Thomases in the land, opera is not moribund in England when such nurseries exist and flourish. 'L'Enfant Prodigue' was a most satisfactory show, the three principals, Irene Morden, Markby Ryan, and Brinley Harris being in their respective parts excellently good. In Markby Ryan the Academy has a bass-baritone who is a worthy successor to Arthur Fear.

The end of the term orchestral concert will take place at Queen's Hall on the afternoon of March 20, when Sir Henry Wood will conduct. Included in the programme will be Goldmark's Overture 'Sakuntala,' and two movements from Tchaikovsky's Symphony Pathétique.

Apropos of Jean Campbell-Kemp, a message came from the B.N.O.C. for a singer to take the part of Eva in 'Die Meistersinger.' At a moment's notice she had set forth, and was most successful. No better illustration of the worth of the Opera Class and of the annual opera performances at the Scala Theatre is needed. Indeed, when the request came, Mr. Julius Harrison, the conductor of the Opera Class, is said to have asked Mr. Frederic Austin, 'How many Eva's shall I send?' F.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

Following on the performances of scenes from 'Aida' and 'Samson and Delilah' early in the term, the Opera Class gave two complete performances of 'Hansel and Gretel' on February 12 and 19. The caste of the principals was duplicated in most cases, all the characters except the Witch being changed for the second performance. A feature of the performances was that they were conducted by a student of the College, who thus gained valuable operatic experience.

College conductors had another opportunity of testing their ability at the concert given by the Second Orchestra on the afternoon of February 12, when the following items were conducted by students working in the Conducting Class: The Overture to 'Son and Stranger' (Mendelssohn), Prelude to 'Lohengrin' (Wagner), Pianoforte Concerto (Haydn), played by Miss Nan Pulvermacher, and Delibes's Ballet Music to 'Sylvia'; in addition, Dr. Malcolm Sargent conducted Haydn's Symphony in D and de Falla's Suite 'El amor brujo.' The performance of this last item, which bristles with strange rhythms and technical difficulties, reflected the greatest possible credit on the orchestra.

At the first Patrons' Fund Rehearsal of the term, devoted to artists and conductors, Miss Dorothy Erhart conducted a Suite by Armstrong Gibbs, 'Crossings.' This choice by Miss Erhart had an additional interest from the fact that it was originally produced at a Patrons' Fund Rehearsal some years ago. Miss Anne Wood sang with insight and intelligence three very little-known songs by Gustav Mahler, Miss Josephine Brown played with charming delicacy and refinement the A major Pianoforte Concerto of Mozart, and Mr. Gethyn Wykeham-George displayed high executive and interpretative qualities in two movements from Dvorák's 'Cello Concerto.

The Cobbett Prizes have long been a familiar institution at the College, and during the past month the second half of the 1928-29 competition was awarded. The scope of this portion of the competition was the performance of the prize compositions, namely, Miss Imogen Holst's Phantasy Quartet and Miss Grace Williams's Phantasy Quintet. Three sets of players entered for the former, and the prize of fifteen guineas was divided amongst the following: Reginald Morley, Barbara Pulvermacher, Mary Gladden, and Alexander Nifosi (eight guineas); Helen Stewart, Kathleen Curry, Mary Gladden, and Irene Richards (seven guineas.

There was only one entry for the performance of Miss Williams's work, but this reached a sufficiently high standard to justify the award of a prize of five guineas.

The result of the competition for the Hopkinson gold and silver medals has been announced, the gold medal being awarded to Miss Fredericka Hartnell and the silver medal to Miss Millicent Silver. Dr. Ernest Walker was the examiner.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

In reviewing the work of the students so far this term we find that good preparation is going on for the Queen's Hall invitation orchestral concert to be given in April, as well as for the Grotrian Hall chamber music concert. Reverting to the April orchestral concert: the day on which this is given is usually the annual presentation day, but this year the distribution of prizes and diplomas has been postponed to the occasion of the orchestral concert to be given on June 29. Then, too, the Opera Class is busy with rehearsals of 'Monsieur Beaucaire,' to be produced at the Scala Theatre in early July.

On Wednesday, March 6, Mr. Egerton Lowe will lecture on 'Pianoforte Playing.' This lecture is open free to the public.

Distributions of prizes and certificates at which the College has been represented have been held at Brixton, Cambridge, Chatham, Cheltenham, Halifax, New Cross, Oxford, Southend, Sheffield, Swindon, Torquay, Watford, Wigan, and Winchester.

As a result of the competition recently held the following scholarships have been awarded: For one year—Pianoforte, W. H. Davies, E. M. Essenhigh, K. M. Hone; Singing, E. M. Essenhigh, R. A. Parry; Violin, L. Dobroshitski, C. Goldberg, L. Perkoff; Violoncello, F. H. Stainer, E. M. Thorp. For one term on probation—Pianoforte, R. B. Dennis, G. M. Morgan, M. A. I. Noble; Singing, M. D. Stone.

University Degree Scholarships (awarded provisionally for one year when the Intermediate Mus. Bac. examination must be passed), Alan Carter and Alfred Felber.

London Concerts

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

Schnabel's playing of the 'Emperor,' on January 31, suggested that he knew more about the music than Busoni, Paderewski, and the giants of old—a tall suggestion, but an admissible one, for the world's appreciation of Beethoven has grown more intelligent during the last decade or so, and there is no reason why a pianist with the technique of finger and mind should not discover something that was unknown to 19th-century tradition. Schnabel seemed to put a new coat on the music, and it made the old familiar garment that it replaced a trifle faded.

For the rest, it was a Cameron night. A last-minute engagement twelve months ago suddenly put Mr. Basil Cameron among the elect, and there no doubt he will remain. There are no magnetic tricks in his style, and no messages to the audience—just a sound and well-detailed working method such as an orchestra likes, with imagination at play behind it. Mr. Cameron conducted the 'Manfred' Overture, Goossens's 'Sinfonietta,' and Brahms's third Symphony. M.

B.B.C. SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 'Kaisermarsch' has somewhat dropped out of value during the last fifteen years. One guesses that its revival on February 1, with the National Chorus to help, was due to the proximity of the ex-Kaiser's seventieth birthday, for, with a subtlety that was very creditable to the B.B.C., there was no announcement that the events were connected.

Wagner's piece of pumped-up enthusiasm sounded very well except for the dull effect of the unison choral singing. Wagner wrote the choral part for the vulgus to sing, but a national chorus might have four parts written in. May we hope for this on the occasion of the ex-Kaiser's eightieth birthday?

The choir had a better chance in Eric Fogg's 'The Hillside,' of which it gave the first performance in London, and one had time to admire the richness of its tone and the alertness with which it tackles a job—plenty of time, for the music lingers without absorbing the attention. Tagore's poem breathes gently, but there is movement in its syllables; they should drift easily along, in the lightest of musical company. But Mr. Fogg's music clogged their feet and put a stop to their drift. The words always seemed to be waiting for the slow-witted strains to catch them up.

Mr. Fogg conducted his own work. Sir Landon Ronald, as conductor-in-chief of the concert, was admirable in a Haydn Symphony and Rachmaninov's second. M.

B.B.C. CHAMBER CONCERT

The programme of the B.B.C. chamber concert held in the Arts Theatre Club on February 4, was for once in a way free from contemporary music from Central Europe, the evening being devoted to songs by Fauré, Ravel, Honegger, Poulenc, Milhaud, and others, sung by Madame Claire Croiza, and to two works for violin by English composers, Delius's second Sonata in one movement, and a new Sonata by Arnold Bax. Both these were played by Messrs. Emil Telmanyi (violin) and Arnold Bax (pianoforte). The evening provided a welcome change after the rather persistent worship at the shrine of Schönberg which had characterised the previous concerts. The incense was becoming stale.

Interest on this occasion centered chiefly upon the first performance of the Sonata by Bax. M. Telmanyi's vigorous tone was anything but suited to the pensive, rhapsodic style of Delius; the effect was like an attempt to reproduce a Turner sunrise with the means and methods of early Gothic sculpture; the delicate curves and washes of harmony which contribute so much to the charm of Delius were destroyed, and there remained but a jagged and harsh caricature of the original. But when it came to the Bax Sonata this style of playing did not seem so out of place. Bax's music, when it is not deliberately lyrical, will stand for a certain amount of rough treatment. The first of the two movements of this work reminded us, on first hearing, of the proverb about quarts and pint pots. The material sounded too heavy for the medium selected, its conception too broad and orchestral for the intimacy of chamber music, although, as is the case in all Bax's music, the writing for the pianoforte is pianoforte writing—if only for the few whose technique is on a level with that of the composer—and the writing for violin is violin writing. The sheer complexity of ideas seems to call for a larger canvas. There was some fun and 'rough stuff' in the second movement, but on the whole it was a disappointment. It is rarely that one meets with such naïve tunes and rhythms from Bax. Let him remember he is Irish, and refrain from these unfortunate translations from the Russian.

The French songs had a distinct family resemblance to one another, but the irritating little mannerisms were forgotten in Madame Croiza's exquisite performance. Three songs by Fauré and Ravel's difficult Mallarmé songs left the deepest impression. Poulenc and Milhaud were represented respectively by 'Le Bestiare' and 'Catalogue des Fleurs.' The former composer's thumb-nail essays in Nature study were slight and amusing, but only the instrumental accompaniment appeared to have any connection with the words. Milhaud's 'Catalogue,' I have to confess, beats me every time I hear it. If he had written vulgar tunes to fit the seedsman's eulogy of his wares perhaps the audience might laugh with him, but when the composer solemnly sets out to be soulful about a few high-falutin' botanical names, he is merely a bore.

By the way, was it really necessary to have a conductor to keep a string quartet together to accompany Honegger's 'Pâques à New York'? P. H.

HUNGARIAN QUARTET

The Hungarian Quartet won our gratitude for an exceedingly lucid performance of a work by their distinguished countryman, Zoltán Kodály. In this country Kodály is known chiefly by his 'Psalmus Hungaricus' simply because there are in England more choirs than quartets. But I venture to think that the Quartet will live when the Psalmus is forgotten. Individual and modern as the Quartet is, it is also completely free from the weakness of most modern music. The last movement lacks, perhaps, some of the strength and point of the first, but nowhere is there a bar to which reasonable critics could take exception; the harmonic scheme is 'advanced' but not outrageous, and obviously is part of the composer's idiom; there are no wearisome repetitions or wilful, extravagant tricks of colour.

It made a very favourable impression, and one felt that the interpreters had given their whole mind and heart to the playing of it. Obviously Kodály's Quartet interests those who perform it as much as those who listen to the performance. I shall look forward with considerable pleasure to a repetition of this most attractive experience. F. B.

SPENCER DYKE QUARTET

The Spencer Dyke Quartet began its recital on January 22 with an exceedingly well-balanced reading of Beethoven's F minor Quartet, which was followed by a new work, the composer of which, Gordon Jacob, is already known as an able pianist and an alert impresario. Mr. Jacob approaches the quartet without any particular bias. At first he seemed determined to impress us with his independence and 'modern' outlook; then it appeared as if the word 'modern' would need to be qualified by the addition of ma non troppo: later still all traces of the boasted independence and modernity seemed to have disappeared. It is, of course, nothing new for a young composer to reveal here and there immaturity of style. There was a time when Wagner himself betrayed the influence of Bellini, and in time Mr. Jacob may himself develop an individuality of which there is little sign at present. But the Quartet is a pleasant enough piece of music, which perhaps does not exploit to the full the best possibilities of the medium, but also free from the now common tendency to mistake a purely technical for a real musical interest. F. B.

HEWITT QUARTET

The Hewitt Quartet concluded its recitals without causing us to alter the opinion we had formed of its abilities at the first concert. The playing is accurate but not immaculate; the readings command respect but not enthusiasm. And perhaps it is inevitable, in the circumstances, that these players should be heard to the best advantage in modern music. There this coolness, this academic atmosphere, this complete detachment, is a decided advantage. When the players come to Beethoven (as they did at the last recital), they have nothing to say of their own, nor can they repeat without some loss what has been said by others. It must be remembered, of course, that quartet playing is now better than it has ever been, and if the judgment one has to pass on Mr. Hewitt and his colleagues is not undiluted praise, it is that they fully deserve to be judged by the highest standards. Of the new Quartet by Jarecki, which was introduced by Mr. Hewitt and his colleagues, all that need be said is that it was played, it was heard, it did not conquer. F. B.

BUDAPEST TRIO

The recital of the Budapest Trio suggested various improvements in the technique of the players and in the ensemble. The pianist still tends to act the bull now and again, and overwhelm the strings. But on the whole the desire to secure a fair balance of tone exists, and we must not forget the strings suffer from congenital weakness when matched by a grand pianoforte. The programme consisted of a classical and two modern compositions. The Trio of Ildebrando Pizzetti —new to most of us—well shows the serious aims and the unusual partiality of this composer for tunes of the folk-song type. Unlike other composers he never makes capital of the more obvious qualities of the Italian folk-song—its melodic lining, its unsophisticated rhythms. He gives us rather an impression of popular melodies; he wants us to share with him their finer qualities, the suggestion of something simple and elemental yet intensely poetic in quality and evanescent. Its opposite number was the Tchaikovsky Trio 'In Memory of a Great Artist,' the full romantic glow of which the Budapest Trio realised well. But the day when these things moved us very deeply is passed. F. B.

ST. CECILIA FESTIVAL

There is something very attractive about unison singing, if it is well done. And it invariably is well done at the St. Cecilia Festival when a choir of five hundred voices, drawn from girls' clubs, sings under Mr. Harvey Grace's direction, with Dr. Darke playing the organ. For there is no trace of ponderousness nor of forced tone; it is all perfectly flexible yet precise, substantial but not solid, nimble and fresh.

Presumably some music is fitter than other for this sort of treatment, yet at Queen's Hall, on February 9, arias of Bach and Handel, folk-songs, and modern songs by Harvey Grace, Vaughan Williams, Thomas Wood, and others, all seemed to go equally well. Descants, perhaps, are still better, or at any rate they lend variety of a different kind from that of the part-songs which also figure in these programmes. The choir in its turn becomes an audience when soloists like Miss Sybil Eaton and Mr. Dale Smith play and sing. And so the concert is called a Festival because it approximates in both form and spirit to those happy functions which crown the work of the competition meetings and appropriately bear that name. An amateur orchestra specially organized ad hoc by Mr. Humphrey Kempe helps with the accompaniments, and contributes pieces of its own—all in the festival spirit. F. H.

SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL

Both the programme and the performance were exceptionally good at Southwark Cathedral on February 9. It sometimes happens that the cathedral atmosphere overwhelms these special musical services so that the always interesting works chosen approximate in sound to an ordinary anthem. This reproach could not have been levelled on this occasion even at Brahms's 'Song of Destiny,' which, by reason of its familiarity and position at the beginning of the programme, might have found the choir (by the way, it contained some women's voices) unalert. It would have been fatal in Kodály's 'Psalmus Hungaricus,' which was undoubtedly what chiefly attracted the very large congregation. This furious work depends very largely on the tenor soloist. Mr. Steuart Wilson brought to it the right intensity of feeling, and the choir caught the flame from him.

Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus' also received a thoroughly alive performance. Here, perhaps, it was the sheer difficulty of dovetailing details from awkwardly disposed forces that gave the impression of special vigilance on the part of the choir—the solo from a distance, for example, was not quite in tune, and the semi-choir was mixed up with the main body of singers. The work depends so much on its 'effects' that the conductor's chief pre-occupation will be with its joinery. Mr. Edgar Cook undoubtedly made a good job of it, but he did not quite avoid giving the feeling that if it could have been sung straight through again, there and then, a magnificent performance would have followed a good one. Between the two big choral works the London Symphony Orchestra played Franck's Symphony, and played it well.

A friend of the Cathedral had contributed a large sum towards the expenses. He has the satisfaction of knowing that he got for his money (and gave to the rest of us) one of the best afternoon's music ever heard at Southwark. And that is saying a good deal. F. H.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

An operatic programme at a concert of the Royal Choral Society is something of an event, for this excellent chorus is supposed to be trained in favour of music which encourages silent meditation. How utterly unfounded such a suggestion is was proved by the great energy and gusto the singers put into their singing when Dr. Malcolm Sargent led them first to the Hall of Song on the Wartburg and then to the fields where the Mastersingers acclaim Hans Sachs and his pupil. If all musical performances were as clear technically, and as spirited, Beckmesser's office would be a sinecure. And the audience which filled the hall of song by the Albert Memorial rose to the occasion. Every item was keenly appreciated, and the meeting of the bards aroused a feeling which anywhere else would have been a warm demonstration of enthusiasm. The singers were all known and trusty—Miss Miriam Licette, Mr. William Boland, and Mr. Keith Falkner can be relied upon to do justice to the familiar parts of Elsa and Elizabeth, of Lohengrin and Walther, of Hans Sachs. F. B.

SHURA CHERKASSKY

Mr. Shura Cherkassky, who gave a pianoforte recital at Æolian Hall on January 31, is said to be still so young as to class his performance as prodigious. But the ear alone gave no hint that he was still young. His technical accomplishment was prodigious in the loose, colloquial sense of the word—such double-octave playing as his took the breath away not only as a feat of physical prowess, but for its clean musical beauty. But he was no mere virtuoso pianist of the fast and loud type, for although he played Liszt (a transcription of the G minor Organ Fantasia and Fugue, and the B minor Sonata), he played it with his own very musical interpretation.

The Fugue, indeed, was more Liszt than Bach with its high speed and sharp contrasts, but it was a consistent and thoroughly thought-out piece of work, while the poetry behind the rhetoric of the Sonata was fully appreciated in the most lovely varieties of tone. There was therefore virtuosity, speed, and loud tone (but it was never beaten out with sheer brute force as is so often done), and uncanny precision. But all these things, usually regarded as ends in themselves, were subservient to a musical purpose, and that purpose showed insight remarkable in a young artist. F. H.

ELEANOR TOYE

Miss Eleanor Toye, who sang at Grotrian Hall, should do really well in her chosen profession. She sings in tune, and sinks herself in the spirit of her music. If her training so far has not been of the sort to enable her to change colour to any marked degree, it has at any rate left her voice unfettered and spring-like. Miss Toye's high notes, in particular, are to be admired for their ease and sweetness, and in certain types of song one could not wish to hear a more ingratiating singer.

Certain qualities, however, she at present lacks. She seemed to be uncertain how to strengthen an emphasis. When the text called for intensity, one would willingly have had less suavity and a tone that rang more brightly. Emerson once spoke of the 'stomachic enunciation' of the English. We felt this to be lacking in Miss Toye, English though she is. Her speech sounded impersonal and her inflections too casual. It seemed as though she feared to break up the line of her phrases. Yet if the breath is being equably paid out and the throat is free, consonants cannot impair the flow of tone. And without them one of the chief factors of characterisation is lost.

A more resonant quality in the lower part of Miss Toye's voice is desirable, and one felt that an immediate improvement could be made by the adoption of a smiling position of lips and teeth and a conscious focussing of breath on the hard palate. The programme was full of interest. H. J. K.

LEONARD ASHDOWNE

Mr. Leonard Ashdowne, who sang at Wigmore Hall, achieved a measure of success which was due to good words and dignified tone. Effects arising from a considered breath control, leaping contrasts, or imaginative qualities were few and far between. By no means a mettlesome singer, then, but all the same a very pleasant one. His baritone voice was dark in colour, and perhaps it was naturally too small to serve aggressive tactics of any kind. His utterance was too neat to kindle enthusiasm.

His habit of moving carefully from vowel to vowel robbed his singing in German of some of its significance, and caused him to stiffen his tone on high notes. But on coming to a group of English songs Mr. Ashdowne showed his true bent. Here we had genial manners, wit, and tenderness, and all went well. H. J. K.

Music in the Provinces

Bath.—Mendelssohn's 'Reformation' Symphony was performed by the Pump Room Orchestra, under Mr. Jan Hurst, on January 23.

Birmingham.—On January 23, in the absence of Mr. G. D. Cunningham, Dr. Malcolm Sargent conducted the City of Birmingham Choir in Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord,' Bantock's 'The Golden Journey to Samarkand,' Vaughan Williams's 'Just as the tide was flowing,' and a group of madrigals. Among the pianoforte solos contributed to the programme by Mr. Michael Mullinar were five Sonatas by Cimarosa.——At the West End Cinema concert, on January 20, Dr. Boult conducted the City Orchestra in Schubert's sixth Symphony (in C), Butterworth's 'Two Folk-song Idylls,' and Bantock's 'Old English' Suite. Miss Marie Howes, accompanied at the harpsichord by Mr. Frank Howes, sang Rameau's Cantata 'Diana and Actæon' and an Old English group.——Dohnányi, who had not been at Birmingham for thirty years, conducted the 'Eroïca' Symphony and his 'Ruralia Hungarica' on January 24, and played the pianoforte part of his 'Variations on a Nursery Tune,' and Dr. Boult conducted.——The conductor at the West End Cinema on January 27 was Sir Thomas Beecham, whose programme included the Salzburg C major Symphony of Mozart and the Delius 'Cuckoo' and 'Summer Night' pieces. He also gave his hundred and thirtieth speech on the Imperial League of Opera.——Mr. Joseph Lewis conducted the Orchestra on February 2 in the 'New World' Symphony, Bantock's 'Helena' Variations, and Mozart's 'Lucia Silla' Overture.——Miss Mary Abbott joined the Philharmonic String Quartet on January 29 in Pianoforte Quintets by Brahms and Josef Suk. A week later the Quartet, led by Miss J. Lamb, played Elgar's Quartet.——Schnabel played at a recent Max Mossel concert.

Bognor.—Ethel Smyth's 'A Spring Canticle' and 'Hey Nonny No,' Bantock's 'Sea Wanderers,' and Warlock's 'Three Carols' were sung by the Bognor Philharmonic Society recently under Mr. Norman Demuth. The orchestral works included Schubert's fifth Symphony (in B flat), and Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto played by Mr. Albert Sammons.

Bolton.—At the Choral Union concert on January 23 Sir Hamilton Harty conducted the Hallé Orchestra in Schubert's C major Symphony and Butterworth's 'Banks of Grey Willow,' and the choir, under Mr. Thomas Booth, sang 'The Lord is my Shepherd' and 'Give the king Thy Judgments,' from Bantock's 'Song of Songs.'

Bradford.—Mr. Albert Sammons played Elgar's Violin Concerto on January 19 at the Subscription Concert given by the Permanent Orchestra under Dr. Malcolm Sargent.——At the Philharmonic concert on February 3, Mr. Julius Harrison conducted the Leeds Symphony Orchestra in Dvorák's Symphony in D minor, Berlioz's 'Le Corsaire' Overture, and Sibelius's

'En Saga.'——Franck's Pianoforte Quintet was played by Mr. William Murdoch and the Virtuoso String Quartet on January 20.

Bristol.—The Choral Symphony was performed by the Choral Society on February 9, the choir of three hundred and seventy and the orchestra of sixty being under the direction of Sir Thomas Beecham. The work had been studied under Mr. C. Kingsley Killip, who conducted the performance of Brahms's 'Song of Destiny.' The instrumental pieces included the Handel-Beecham 'The Gods go a-begging' Suite and a short piece for strings from Grétry's 'Zemire et Azor.'——The annual Ladies' Night concert of the Bristol Royal Orpheus Glee Society was, as usual, a popular success. Mr. George Riseley conducted for the fifty-second year in succession. Dr. Lee Williams took the baton for the performance of 'Dormi, Jesu!' and 'Break, Break, Break.'——A concert of out-of-the-way works was given at the Little Theatre on January 19. Miss Catherine Startup played violin solos by Pugnani and Steibelt, and took part in a Suite by Quantz for flute (Mr. Charles Souper), viola (Miss Madeleine Jacobi), 'cello (Mr. Eric Luton), and violin. Miss Lucy Vincent played Mozart's Andante for oboe.——On February 6 the Clifton Quartet played a Quartet by C. S. Lang, of Clifton College, and were joined by Mr. F. Littlepage (double-bass) in Schubert's 'Trout' Quintet.

Carlisle.—Brahms's 'Requiem' was sung by the Choral Society under Dr. Wadely on January 24, the principals being Mr. George Baker and Miss Mabel Ritchie.

Cavendish.—The Choral Society sang Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' on February 5, conducted by Mr. Harold Vincent.

Derby.—A highly successful performance of Elgar's 'From the Bavarian Highlands' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan' was given by the Derby Co-operative Society with orchestra in Central Hall, on January 25, under the Society's conductor, Mr. Frederick J. Stevenson.

Fleet.—Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin' and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George,' with small choral items, made up an enjoyable concert given by the Fleet Musical Society on February 5. Mr. W. J. Marks conducted.

Gloucester.—The annual concert of the Orpheus Society, held on January 31 under Mr. S. W. Underwood, provided a pleasant evening of male-voice music of the better class. This included Lloyd's 'Let my voice ring out,' Holst's three Hymns from the 'Rig Veda,' a new setting of 'The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,' which was conducted by the composer, Dr. C. Lee Williams, and some new arrangements of old tunes by Mr. Underwood.——The Pro Arte players, on a visit for the Gloucester Chamber Music Society, gave Rieti's Quartet in F.

Guildford.—The coming-of-age of the Guildford Subscription Concerts is being celebrated in a series of which the first, held on February 5, took the form of a recital by Miss Sybil Eaton and Mr. Plunket Greene. The second programme, on February 19, was a song-recital by Mr. John Coates. The orchestra is to play under Mr. Claud Powell on March 5.

Halifax.—A concert was given at Victory Hall on January 24 by Bradford Philharmonic Orchestra, under Mr. Keith Douglas, the programme including the 'Emperor' Concerto, played by Mr. William Murdoch, Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony, the 'Boutique Fantasque' Suite, and the Entr'acte from 'A Village Romeo and Juliet.'

Hereford.—The 'Jupiter' Symphony, the 'Prometheus' Overture, and some Schumann and Vaughan Williams made up a good scheme played by the Hereford Orchestral Society on February 13, conducted by Dr. Percy Hull. In the Schumann 'Concertstück' for pianoforte and orchestra, Mrs. Percy Hull was the soloist. Miss Betty Bannerman sang.——The Harmonic Society at its concert on February 5 sang Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and some small choral works, conducted by Mr. Hubert Hampton.

Hertford.—The East Herts Musical Society gave 'King Olaf' on January 31, under the direction of Mr. W. J. Comley, the principal parts being taken by Miss Dorothy Robson, Mr. Frederick Steger, and Mr. Frank Phillips.

Hucknall.—'Merrie England' was sung on February 13 by the Hucknall Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. Henry Dobson, with Miss Eveline Stevenson, Miss Kathleen Coxon, Mr. George Hedges, and Mr. Ernest Platts as soloists.

Hull.—Sir Henry Wood conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra in Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony on January 31. The programme included an Overture, 'Red Riding Hood,' by C. H. Phillips.

Ipswich.—Miss Elisabeth Schumann and Mr. William Primrose took part in the concert given by the Male-Voice Choir on February 6. Under Mr. Jonathan Job the choir sang three of Bantock's 'Seven Burdens of Isaiah' and Cecil Forsyth's 'Kubla Khan.'——Bax's Flute and Harp Sonata was played at the Public Library by Mr. C. Kony and Madame Korchinska.——Ravel's A minor Trio was played by the Budapest Trio at the Garratt Memorial Hall.

Leamington.—Morley, Elgar, Holst, Vaughan Williams, and Charles Wood were names in the programme of the Male-Voice Choir's concert under Mr. S. F. Bates on February 7. Mr. Steuart Wilson's singing and Mr. Howard-Jones's pianoforte-playing added to the importance and attractiveness of the occasion.

Leeds.—On January 26 the Symphony Society, a body of amateurs under the direction of Mr. Harold Mason, played German's Welsh Rhapsody, Dunhill's 'Guildford' Suite, and, with Madame Charlotte Davies, two movements of Mozart's A minor Pianoforte Concerto.——The Yorkshire String Quartet played Beethoven's Op. 130 at the Bohemian Chamber Concert on February 6.——Madame Suggia was the soloist in Lalo's Concerto at the Leeds Symphony Orchestra concert, conducted by Mr. Julius Harrison, on February 9.

Leigh (Lancs).—The Leigh Church Players gave 'An Elizabethan Daye' on 'Februarye nynth and syxth' (thus the programme), in which were strung together many well-known Elizabethan songs and madrigals chosen and arranged by Mr. G. Parker, who directed operations.

Lichfield.—The Lichfield Musical Society gave its fifty-third concert on February 1, with Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' as the chief items. The orchestra played some Handel, and Miss Emily Broughton, Mr. Ronald Cooke, and Madame Northall sang solos. Mr. Ambrose P. Porter conducted.

Liverpool.—'Appalachia' was conducted by Sir Henry Wood at the Philharmonic concert on January 29, other works of the occasion being a little-known Symphony in G by Mozart and Tchaikovsky's 'Hamlet.'——A Dolmetsch recital was given on January 26, with a varied and characteristic programme.——At the B.M.S. concert on February 7 the programme included Goossens's 'Phantasy' Quartet and Pianoforte Quintet, and a Quintet by Lawrence Collingwood.

Manchester.—Sir Edward Elgar conducted the performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius' at the Brand Lane concert on January 26. The principals were Mr. Steuart Wilson, Miss Muriel Brunskill, and Mr. Harold Williams.——At recent Hallé concerts the works of chief interest have been as follows: January 17, Boyce's Sinfonia in B flat, Bax's 'In the faery hills,' Dohnányi's 'Ruralia Hungarica' (conducted by the composer); January 24, 'Don Juan,' 'Death and Transfiguration,' and 'Till Eulenspiegel'; January 31, Schumann's fourth Symphony; February 7, Bach's 'Now shall the grace,' Elgar's 'The Music-Makers,' Harty's 'With the wild geese,' Delius's 'Sea-Drift,' Bantock's 'The Pierrot of the Minute,' Bax's 'Mater ora filium,' and Stanford's first Irish Rhapsody.——

At the Municipal Concerts on January 21, under Sir Hamilton Harty, the programme included Glazounov's fourth Symphony and Mozart's Bassoon Concerto in B flat, played by Mr. Archie Camden.——Ravel's Quartet, Dittersdorf's in E flat, and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet were played at the Catterall concert on January 30. (For other Manchester notes, see p. 265.)

Newcastle.—The concert of the Choral Union mentioned in our last issue was conducted by Mr. George Dodds, the Society's conductor, and not by Capt. Amers.——On February 2 the Bach Choir gave a concert of Northumbrian and Cumbrian folk-songs. Some were in choral form, as arranged and conducted by Dr. Whittaker. Others were still songs, with Miss Ena Mitchell and Mr. Ernest J. Potts as their singers, and some were given by Miss Annie Eckford as pianoforte solos written by Jeffrey Mark, Holst, and Ernest Farrar.——Quartets by McEwen, Frank Bridge, and Bax were played by the Virtuoso Quartet at a B.M.S. Concert on January 19.——Mozart's Concerto for flute and harp was played by Mr. E. J. Bell and Miss Gwendolen Mason at the Philharmonic Society's concert under Mr. Bainton on January 27.

Norwich.—Vaughan Williams's Overture to 'The Wasps' and Beethoven's Violin Concerto, played by Miss Isolde Menges, were the chief items in the programme given by the Philharmonic Society under Dr. Statham on January 24.——Miss Raya Garbousova appeared at the Municipal Concert conducted by Mr. Maddern Williams on January 26.——Mr. Cyril Pearce's second chamber concert opened with Mozart's Trio in E flat for pianoforte, clarinet, and viola, and ended with Dunhill's Phantasy-Trio for pianoforte, violin, and viola.——The Norwich String Quartet played Mozart and Mendelssohn on February 7.

Nottingham.—The Sacred Harmonic Society invited the Hallé Orchestra and Sir Hamilton Harty to give a concert on its behalf on February 6. The programme consisted of the third 'Leonora' Overture, Franck's Symphony, the Theme and Variations from Tchaikovsky's third Suite, and an excerpt from 'Coq d'Or.' ——Mr. William Woolley's choir gave a concert of unaccompanied part-singing on January 31, the chief works being Cornelius's 'The surrender of the soul,' Parry's 'There is an old belief,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Fair of Almachara,' Mr. Woolley's 'The Skylark,' and a selection of madrigals.

Oxford.—At the fourth Subscription concert a varied programme was given by the Æolian Chamber Orchestra under Mr. Guy Warrack. It included a Concerto in D minor by Mudge, four songs from Arne's 'Alfred,' Jensen's 'Reigen,' Mozart's Bassoon Concerto, played by Mr. Richard Newton, Mr. Warrack's 'Wiegenlied,' and Vaughan Williams's 'On Wenlock Edge' cycle, sung by Mr. Steuart Wilson.——'Samson' was performed at the Town Hall on January 27 by the West Oxford Choral Society under Mr. A. Louis Smith.

Rayleigh.—The Choral Society sang Mendelssohn's thirteenth Psalm and Elgar's 'Banner of St. George' on February 2, conducted by Mr. Donald Priestley.

Richmond (Yorks).—The Richmondshire Choral Society chose a varied programme for its concert on February 12—Bach's 'Coffee' Cantata, Balfour Gardiner's 'News from Whydah,' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' The soloists were Miss Edna Hodgeson, Mr. W. A. Hepworth, and Mr. Raymond Borrows. The Yorkshire String Quartet played Handel and Raff. Mr. Arthur Fountain conducted.

St. Alban's.—The St. Alban's Bach Choir gave Brahms's 'Requiem' and Bach's 'Sleepers, wake,' on February 5, conducted by Mr. W. L. Luttman. Miss Joan Elwes, Mr. Roy Henderson, and Mr. Bertram Davies were the soloists.

Southampton.—At the second Philharmonic concert of the season, Bach's 'Peasant' Cantata and Holst's 'Rig-Veda' Hymns were performed under the conductorship of Mr. Ronald Dussek. The soloists were Miss Bertha Steventon and Mr. Howard Fry. Robin Milford's Suite in D minor (for oboe and strings), Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite, and pieces by Bach and Grainger were played by the orchestra.——Commencing on February 4 the B.N.O.C. gave a successful opera week at the new Empire Theatre. Eight operas were performed, the conductors being Eugène Goossens (sen.), John Barbirolli, and Leslie Heward.——On February 13, Sir Thomas Beecham visited Southampton to explain the aims and objects of the Imperial League of Opera, and to form an organization for the Hampshire district. A meeting was held in the Mayor's Parlour, under the chairmanship of the Mayor (Councillor M. H. Pugh), and it was unanimously decided to form the necessary organization which will bring the district within the scope of the Beecham scheme.

Sunderland.—Chorales by Bach and part-songs and madrigals by Balfour Gardiner, Coleridge-Taylor, and Weelkes, were sung by the Sunderland Philharmonic Society on February 7, under Mr. R. F. Jarman.

Tonbridge.—Under the direction of Mr. George J. Kimmins the Tonbridge Choral Society gave Schubert's 'The Song of Miriam,' 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' and 'Great is Jehovah,' Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' and Eaton Faning's 'The Song of the Vikings.'

Watford.—At a concert given by the Aldenham Orchestral Society on January 23, the works conducted by Mr. Ludwig Lebell included 'Suite in the Old Style,' by Delibes, a Concerto for strings by Humphries, and a Symphony and Concerto by Mozart.

Winchester.—The Winchester Music Club gave its last concert of the season on February 5, conducted by Dr. George Dyson. Success was scored by Dr. Dyson's new choral work, 'In Honour of the City.' The choir also sang madrigals. Other items were Haydn's 'London' Symphony, harp solos by Debussy and Hamilton Harty, &c.

Woking.—The Musical Society had an appreciative audience on February 5, when it gave a concert consisting principally of works for string orchestra—a Purcell Suite arranged by Albert Coates, Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, and Serenade, and a Glazounov Suite. Mr. Ronald Dussek conducted.

HOLBROOKE'S 'BRONWEN'

The first performance of Josef Holbrooke's 'Bronwen,' by the Carl Rosa Company, at Huddersfield, was a profound disappointment: not because of any actual failing of its music, but because it proved—and proved conclusively—what infinitely better work Holbrooke could have done if he had not fallen into the error of believing that only in following the Wagnerian pattern can salvation be found. I frankly cannot understand this attitude of humility on the part of the composer—and librettist—of 'Bronwen.' It seems inconceivable that any pattern should be accepted without close scrutiny, that any composer should be satisfied with a story because it has certain elements in common with another 'successful' story. The ambition to do for Great Britain what Wagner did for Germany is a noble idea. But before one can hope to succeed in achieving it, it is necessary to take into consideration racial characteristics. The symbolism which the German loves may be less desirable where men and women have a keener sense of humour. When in the third Act of 'Bronwen' one of the few survivors of the battle between British and Irish proceeds to cut off the head of the king of England, even the hardy, sturdy audience of Huddersfield could not repress a smile. When the magic cauldron was shattered at a blow, and warriors began to chase one another up and down the stage, the atmosphere was that of pantomime, not of drama. The use of the kinema at the end, was again purely artificial and, far from heightening, hindered the suggestive power of music. To these dramatic failings, attributable to the libretto, must be added some due to other causes. One of the singers—probably suffering from a cold—suddenly and unexpectedly gave up all pretence of singing and spoke his part. At another point an address to the crowd was delivered to an empty stage. These, and the uncertainty of the orchestral playing, robbed the performance of some of its means of force and effect. But it is rather significant that when for a moment symbolism disappeared and characters acted like human beings—albeit of a bygone age—the standard of the performance improved and the quality of the music rose at a bound.

If the story had been ruthlessly stripped of symbolism, if instead of that cauldron in which wicked men throw naughty babies, the centre of interest had been shifted round the princess who marries in a foreign land for reasons of state, the result might have been very different. The plot, thus reduced, would be ideal for the purposes of opera. The departure of the king's daughter in the first Act, even as it is, cannot fail to move the spectator. I can imagine no more dramatic contrast than that between the rough warriors who claim her hand and the princess already pledged to one of her countrymen. But that was not enough for the librettist of 'Bronwen.' He wanted symbolism, and he retained all the impossible relations between the characters, which make out Bronwen's English lover to have been her nephew. Is it necessary? Are we any better or wiser for knowing that when he sings 'Sleep, little sister,' he really ought to say, 'Sleep, auntie'? I can imagine no surer way of turning drama into farce.

Holbrooke's score is unequal. The orchestration is at times excellent, at times unnecessarily heavy. The rude vigour of the Irish scenes, the planning of the first episode, and some of the music of the third Act, denote uncommon talent for dramatic writing. But the composer is not over-scrupulous. The dances interpolated in the third Act gave him a fine opportunity of which, however, he availed himself in a half-hearted way. One is excellent, and full of vitality; the other might have come out of Cecil Sharp's collection of folk-songs. For all I know the tune may date from the days of Bronwen. But it is unwise to suggest even a link between the Folk-Song Society and the primitive men who boil a baby without turning a hair. Holbrooke will perhaps write a great opera some day; he could already have one to his credit if he had insisted on scrapping all that in the story of Bronwen is of its time, and retained those human elements which are for all time. MUSIC AT MANCHESTER

The end of the Hallé season is now well in sight. What substantial contribution to an enlarged musical culture has resulted? Our Berlioz knowledge extended, even though estimates of his value be not raised; acquaintance gained with relatively insignificant examples of seldom-heard composers of our own and earlier times; interesting visits from Dohnányi, Medtner, and Ansermet; the Atterberg Symphony in celebration of the Schubert Centenary, which we now know from the composer's own confession in the press to have been conceived more or less as a musical joke. But the years are passing, and musical Manchester still remains ignorant of works of riper and maturer genius exemplified in Arnold Bax's new Symphony, Gustav Holst's Choral Symphony, Stravinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps,' Frederick Delius's 'Mass of Life' and Double Concerto for violin and 'cello, Arthur Bliss's 'Colour' Symphony, Honegger's 'King David,' Kodály's 'Psalmus Hungaricus,' Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces, or the later symphonic work of Sibelius, of Bruckner, of Mahler, not to mention the 'London' or 'Pastoral' Symphonies of Vaughan Williams, the latter of which was scheduled for performance two or three seasons ago, was actually rehearsed, and then the promised performance withdrawn on the laconic plea that the Executive (!) did not think it would appeal to the Hallé type of public. Are we to assume that this same Executive considered the Rubin Goldmark arrangement of 'Negro Spirituals' heard early in this season would appeal to this same public? Is it the wish of the Executive that these concerts should still be regarded as 'Symphony,' as distinct from the more popular type often wrongly called 'Promenade'? Anybody who will examine the nightly programmes played yearly for eight weeks in the London Queen's Hall in the early autumn will find a consistently higher level of substantial musical worth maintained there under more onerous conditions than obtain here. Is it merely fanciful to trace the recently observable decline in fine musical worth of some of the Hallé concerts to the fact of broadcasting arrangements? If so, which counts most—the Society's ideals or those of the B.B.C.?

With scarcely-veiled cynicism the Hallé conductor last July, possibly in response to pleas for a greater recognition of work of the character just named, made 'a sporting offer' of willingness to play any desired new work if only the costs of extra rehearsals were forthcoming. Can it be that this attitude furnishes some clue to conspicuous omissions or inclusions of work in the Hallé programmes? Can the Society's artistic and educational claims be fully acknowledged when relatively trivial works claim attention to the exclusion of those of worthier nature? All these orchestral miniatures demand considerable time in preparation; might not the truer artistic economy, to put it no higher, be the devotion of this amount of time and thought to the study of some of these larger-scale and more æsthetically satisfying works?

Is it not the plain fact that beyond the immediate neighbourhood of Manchester the Society is gradually declining from the proud position held in former days, when, for example, Manchester shared with London the distinction of shaping the appreciation now so lavishly bestowed on Strauss, at a time when he was very much of a problem? Does the Society always quite realise its obligations to so fine a tradition? It would indeed be a pity if the significance of the Hallé Concerts Society were to end within the borders of the county.

It must be regretfully, but candidly admitted that, 'The Messiah' apart, choral concerts are not appreciated here, judging by sparse attendances. Last year 'Israel in Egypt' drew the smallest audience, and much the same happened on February 7, when Delius's 'Sea Drift,' Bax's 'Mater ora Filium,' and Elgar's 'Music-Makers' were sung. I am amongst those who think the Hallé chorus best suited to the monumental works; it is at present completely deficient in the subtler interpretative qualities. Roy Henderson gave them a taste of the way in which Delius's music should be approached—his singing was so sensitive as to make the choral work seem wooden-headed by comparison, and yet hard preparation had been given to this work, and Bax's Motet. Originally Bach's 'Sing ye to the Lord' had been included in the same evening's scheme, but it was quickly evident that the choir was overloaded, and Bach was jettisoned. All concerned were lucky to get through the evening of February 7 without casualties.

The ways of some conductors baffle the sense of mere ordinary listeners. For example, did Elgar ever authorise a fourteen- or fifteen-page 'cut' in his 'Falstaff' poem, or was it just Harty's playfulness in the performance last October? And did Mendelssohn in the 'Italian' Symphony ever score for muted brass in the third movement? Most folk would say 'no,' but some of us undoubtedly heard muted trumpets that night.

The make-up of programmes has been constantly changed in an apparently capricious manner; things do not always run straightly in orchestral matters any more than in other businesses, but the Executive ought to realise that its issue of a fully detailed scheme prior to the commencement of its season, on the strength of which tickets are bought, often to hear specified works, constitutes an implied contract to produce certain articles on a given date. I quote from its preface: 'The programmes given in the following pages form in themselves perhaps the best invitation it would be possible to extend to lovers of orchestral music of the finest kind. If that is not a clear invitation to buy on the strength of the quality of the actual goods offered for sale, then language has no meaning. The Executive includes at least two prominent barristers, and two most eminent business men. Should it not be part of their duty to see that promise and fulfilment in these matters are brought into accord with Manchester commercial practice, and a limit placed on the conductor's caprice in these matters?

Music in Scotland

Aberdeen.—The Aberdeen Oratorio Choir, with the assistance of the Scottish Orchestra, performed Verdi's 'Requiem,' Mr. Willan Swainson conducting.

Coupar Angus.—The Perth Madrigal Society (conductor, Mr. David T. Yacamini) gave a concert of part-songs.

Edinburgh.—The programmes of the Paterson Orchestral Concerts (Scottish Orchestra) were on the same general lines as those of the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union, noticed below. Mr. Albert Coates conducted.——At the fifth of the Reid Orchestral concerts, Dame Ethel Smyth conducted a performance of her own Mass in D, and the programme contained also Somervell's 'Normandy' Variations for pianoforte (soloist, Prof. Tovey) and orchestra (conductor, Dr. Mary Grierson), and Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture. At the sixth concert the programme comprised Bach's third 'Brandenburg' Concerto, Schumann's rarely-heard Concerto, Op. 86, for four horns and orchestra, Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante for violin, viola, and orchestra, and Beethoven's seventh Symphony.——The programmes of Prof. Tovey's Sunday concerts during the month included Handel's Concerto Grosso in B flat, Purcell's second 'Gordian Knot' Suite, and Bach's A major Pianoforte Concerto (soloist, Prof. Tovey), all played by the strings of the Reid Orchestra, Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat, Op. 97, Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in G minor, Op. 25, and a pianoforte recital by Prof. Tovey, comprising Bach's third 'French' Suite, Beethoven's 'Waldstein' Sonata, Schumann's Fantasia, Op. 17, and Brahms's Ballades Nos. 1 and 2, Op. 10, and 'Paganini' Variations.——At the fourth of the series of University Historical concerts, Prof. Tovey presented, with critical and explanatory comments, a Brahms programme, consisting of the 'Cello and Violin Sonatas, Op. 99 and 101, and the C minor Trio for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello, Op. 101.——The Scottish String Quartet gave a programme of string quartets by Haydn, Beethoven, and Dvorák.——The 1928 Choir (conductor, Mr. Robert C. Gray), a recently formed choir of young singers, gave a first concert of part-songs.

Galashiels.—At the third of the series of subscription concerts, the Scottish Orchestra provided the programme, Mr. Albert Coates conducting.

Glasgow.—For the third and final month of the Scottish Orchestra season (Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Union) Mr. Albert Coates succeeded Mr. Albert van Raalte as conductor. The programmes included: Symphonies—Beethoven's C minor, Schubert's 'Tragic' No. 4, in C minor, Brahms's No. 4, in E minor, and Tchaikovsky's No. 5, in E minor; Symphonic Poems, &c.—Scriabin's 'Le Divin Poème' and the 'Poème de l'Extase,' Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini,' Schelling's 'Victory Ball,' and Hadley's 'Lucifer'; Overtures—Beethoven's 'Egmont,' Wagner's 'Flying Dutchman' and 'Mastersingers,' Nicolai's 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' and Glinka's 'Russlan and Ludmilla'; Suites, &c.—Respighi's 'Pines of Rome,' the Scarlatti-Tommasini 'Good-humoured Ladies,' Mozart's 'Kleine Nachtmusik,' for strings, and Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations; Concertos, &c.—Mozart's Violin Concerto in D (Mr. Loris Blofield), Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto (pianoforte, Mr. Frederic Lamond), Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in G minor (Mr. Arthur Rubinstein), Dohnányi's 'Nursery Song' Variations for pianoforte and orchestra (Dohnányi), and de Falla's 'Night in the Gardens of Spain,' for pianoforte and orchestra (Mr. Arthur Rubinstein); Miscellaneous—Borodin's 'Prince Igor' dances, Liadov's 'Four Russian Folk-songs,' and the Bach-Esser Toccata in F. For the final concert the programme was, as usual, chosen by popular vote, and comprised well-worn favourites: Tchaikovsky's Symphony 'Pathétique' and 'Nutcracker' Suite, Beethoven's 'Leonora' No. 3 Overture, and Sibelius's 'Finlandia,' the only surprise item being Schelling's 'Victory Ball' Fantasy! The Glasgow Choral Union and the Scottish Orchestra joined forces, with Mr. Wilfrid Senior as conductor, in performances of Kodály's 'Hungarian Psalm,' Delius's 'Sea Drift,' and Vaughan Williams's 'Sea Symphony.' During the thirteen weeks' season, from November 10 to February 9, the Scottish Orchestra took part in fifty-four concerts—thirty-seven at Glasgow, twelve at Edinburgh, and one each at Aberdeen, Dundee, Dunfermline, Galashiels, and Helensburgh.——The Fellowes String Quartet, led by Mr. Horace Fellowes, gave two chamber concerts, presenting Quartets by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, two by Schubert, and, with the co-operation of other local players, what was announced as the first performance at Glasgow of the Schubert Octet.——Miss Amy Monteith, a young Glasgow pianist, gave a first recital.——The Caledonian House Ladies' Choir, a city warehouse choir with a successful competitive festival record, gave a concert of part-songs, Mr. Thorpe Davie conducting.——The newly-formed Glasgow Chamber Music Society has engaged the Budapest String Quartet to give a week's series of seven chamber concerts in the M'Lellan Galleries, Glasgow, in October. This is stated to be the Budapest Quartet's first visit to Scotland.

Greenock.—The Greenock Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. J. Peebles Conn) gave its annual concert. The programme included Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Mozart's 'Magic Flute' Overture, Mackenzie's 'Britannia' Overture, Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne' Suite No. 2, and Grieg's 'Holberg' Suite for strings.

Helensburgh.—At the second of the series of subscription concerts, the Scottish Orchestra furnished the programme, Mr. Albert van Raalte conducting. The third concert took the form of a recital by Madame Elisabeth Schumann (soprano) and Mr. Angus Morrison (solo pianoforte).

Perth.—The Perth Madrigal Society (conductor, Mr. David T. Yacamini) gave a Scottish concert. The Perth Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. R. P. M'Glynn) gave its annual concert. The most ambitious items were Mozart's Concerto in E flat for two pianofortes and orchestra, and Weber's 'Oberon' Overture.

General.—The 'international celebrity' concerts given at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Stirling, and Ayr comprised a violin recital by Kreisler and a vocal recital by McCormack, assisted by Lauri Kennedy ('cello).——The third of the Max Mossel series of subscription concerts at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Ayr, and Bridge-of-Allan took the form of a recital by Madame Elisabeth Schumann (soprano) and Artur Schnabel (pianoforte), Schnabel making a profound impression on this, his first, visit to Scotland.

Sebastian.

Music in Wales

Aberdare.—The Bethel Choral Society, braving the financial risks of the prevailing depression in this mining area, gave a performance of Dvorák's 'Spectre's Bride,' with the help of an amateur orchestra, conducted by Mr. Dan Edwards. Musically the performance is said to have been highly successful. The soloists were Miss Megan Thomas, Mr. Trefor Jones, and Mr. Frank Phillips.

Aberystwyth.—The programmes of the weekly College concerts have included among the chamber music items Schumann's Quintet, Op. 44, for pianoforte and strings, and Dvorák's Quintet, Op. 81, for the same combination, Schubert's String Quartet in D minor, the Andante and Vivace from Bach's Double Concerto, and Purcell's 'Golden Sonata,' the soloists in both cases being Miss Esmé Silver and Mr. Hubert Pearce. Orchestral items have comprised Mozart's Symphony in G minor, 'Finlandia,' and some small items. Solo instrumental numbers by Handel, Marais, and Marcello have been given by Miss E. Cook (violin), Mr. Hubert Pearce (viola), and Mr. Haydn Lewis ('cello).

BANGOR.—At the fourth special concert the University College Orchestra, under Mr. E. T. Davies, played Holst's Fugal Concerto, a Mozart Violin Concerto with Miss K. Washbourne as soloist, and an interesting Suite for solo pianoforte and strings (Miss Enid Lewis at the pianoforte). At the fifth special concert the Birmingham Chamber Music Players contributed two works which proved of great interest —Elgar's Quartet in E minor and a set of seven Bagatelles under the collective title of 'Nugæ,' by J. B. McEwen. They also collaborated with the College players in a spirited performance of the Mendelssohn Octet.——The weekly programmes during the month have included the Fauré Violin Sonata, a 'Cello Sonata by Henry Eccles, a Haydn Quartet ('Sunrise'), the 'Archduke' Trio, and Frank Bridge's Miniature Trios (second set), together with various vocal items.——Two concerts for children have been given. At the Musical Club concert, on February 7, Mr. Pat Ryan joined the College players in the Mozart and the Brahms Clarinet Quintets. The Mozart was beautifully played. Mr. E. T. Davies is giving a series of eight lectures on 'The History and Development of Musical Art.' The College Choral Society is rehearsing Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion for performance in May.

CARDIFF.—On January 18, the Countess of Plymouth organized a concert in aid of the Miners' Relief Fund. Orchestral items included German's 'Welsh Rhapsody,' Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain,' Moussorgsky's 'Dance of the Tumblers' and Howells's 'Puck's Minuet.' Miss Rosina Buckman contributed a number of vocal items, and the Mountain Ash Girls' Choir, conducted by Miss E. Thomas, sang some part-songs.——On February 6, the Budapest Trio gave a chamber music concert at the Girls' High School, the programme including Ravel's Trio in A minor and Dvorák's 'Dumky' Trio. ——The National Orchestra of Wales has been making a great stride forward in its performances. Recent programmes have included Brahms's Symphonies Nos. 1 and 3, Dvorák's Symphony No. 4, the Overture to 'The Mastersingers,' and Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration.' Lighter items have been Honegger's 'Pacific 231,' Liszt's Rhapsody No. 2, Saint-Saëns's 'Algérienne Suite,' &c. Dohnányi's 'Concertstück' for 'cello and orchestra (soloist, Mr. Ronald Harding), Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E minor (soloist, Mr. W. Primrose), and the 'Liebestod' from 'Tristan and Isolda' (vocalist, Miss Stiles Allen) have also formed parts of the programmes.——Dr. Hopkin Evans recently gave a lecture to the Cardiff Cymmrodorion Society on the renascence of music in the country. He emphasised the influence of the folk-song, and, quoting Sir Henry Hadow, said that 'every artist who had compelled the attention of the world had done so by addressing it as the spokesman of his own people.'—— Mr. Ifor Evans, lecturing on 'German Hymns and Hymn-Tunes,' spoke of the manner in which Bach had used hymn-tune melodies in his works, and said that few of the old Welsh tunes had been given an artistic arrangement. It is possible that the lecturer may have been unaware of the series of fine meditations on famous tunes written for the Harlech Festival a few years ago though it is quite true that good work of this kind is scarce.

NEWPORT (MON.).—On February 4, at the Girls' High School, a chamber music lecture-concert, under the auspices of the National Council of Music, was given by Miss Evelyn Cook (violin), Mr Ronald Harding ('cello), and Mr. Charles Clements (pianist-lecturer). Beethoven's great Trio in B flat, Op. 97, and Brahms's Sonata for pianoforte and violin, in A, Op. 100, were the chief items in the programme, and Miss Cook and Mr. Clements contributed a number of solo items by Bach, Handel, and Purcell.——On February 5, at the Central Hall, the National Orchestra of Wales played Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, Nicolai's Overture to the 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' and an Entr'acte and Berceuse from Massenet's 'Don Cæsar,' together with Liszt's 'Hungarian Rhapsody' No. 2. Miss Davis Bennett and Mr. Ronald Chivers contributed vocal numbers.

GENERAL. — Some considerable interest was aroused a short time ago by the Mid-Rhondda Choir's performance of a Mass by Edward Gardner, a Council roadman and a local amateur. Members of the choir had copied out the parts, and a small orchestra assisted. The work is slight in construction, and simple melody is more obvious than harmonic mastery, but both the work and the circumstances of its performance reflect credit on all concerned.

THE YULE-TIDE FESTIVAL AT VICTORIA, B.C.

Since the inaugural Festival at Quebec some two years ago, similar Festivals, sponsored by the Canadian Pacific Railway, have taken place in various parts of Canada. There has been a general tendency to move westward, with the result that December of the past year witnessed the first of such Festivals on the Pacific Coast, the Yule-tide Festival held at Victoria, British Columbia, from December 22 to Twelfth-Night.

The movement still being somewhat young, a few words in explanation may perhaps not be out of place.

Though it may be safely concluded that the Railway Company has its own interests at heart in the matter, the production of such Festivals as have taken place during the past two years will ultimately prove of untold value to Canada both educationally and internationally.

In each case the outstanding note has been characteristic of the particular part of the country in which the Festivals were being held. At Quebec, the French folk-songs were a prominent feature; at Winnipeg, the many foreign nations that constitute the major part of the population of the prairie provinces were represented with their various folk-songs and dances; Banff was chosen as a fitting setting for a Scottish Festival; and Victoria, said by many to be more like England than any other part of the Empire, was the setting for the recent English Yule-tide Festival. Vancouver, as one of the coming sea-ports of the world, has been chosen for the Sea Music Festival, to be held the latter part of January, and a Festival similar to those already held at Winnipeg, has been arranged to take place in March of this year at Regina.

In Canada generally, and more particularly in the West, music of a generally educational nature is not available to the masses to any great extent, and since the choral work of these Festivals is produced chiefly by local talent under the direction of competent directors, a personal interest in the proceedings has been created. As an ultimate result of the preservation of the national music of the many various races of which Canada is composed, it is not very difficult to foresee that this music will, in the course of generations, become a valuable asset in what will eventually be the National music of Canada.

The programme of the Yule-tide Festival, conducted by Mr. Harold Eustace Key, musical director for the Canadian Pacific Railway, covered a period of two weeks, and opened with a performance of the Chester Mysteries at the Crystal Garden Theatre, on the evening of December 22.

This Mystery play, written by a monk of Chester Abbey, Randal Higden, and first performed exactly six hundred years ago, was the first performance of the kind to be seen at the Coast, although there have been two previous performances at Toronto in connection with Hart House.

To Major Bullock-Webster, of Victoria, from whose dramatic classes the cast was drawn, and under whose direction the initial work was carried out, great credit is due. The finishing touches were given by Mr. J. Harry Smith, of Montreal, and Miss Charlotte Cotter, of Toronto, both of the C.P.R. Press bureau, and both of whom have had considerable experience at Hart House. Considering the inexperience of the players, and the general character of the play, together with the unfamiliar English of the Middle-Ages, a most creditable performance resulted. The costumes were those used previously at Hart House, and the setting was made at Montreal, both being thoroughly artistic and leaving nothing to be desired in this respect. Of the incidental music, composed by Dr. Healey Willan, of Toronto, for a concealed choir and string quintet, and performed by the Elizabethan Quartet and local musicians, it may be said that the result was altogether enjoyable.

Monday brought two more performances of the Chester Mysteries—one in the form of a children's matinée and another evening performance. This was followed the same evening by one of the most impressive events of the whole Festival, the community carol-singing in front of the Parliament Buildings. The setting was unusually attractive, showing the Buildings, that lend themselves unusually well to such treatment, brightly outlined against a clear, fine sky. The crowd, led by Mr. Key (who makes an ideal master of ceremonies for such occasions), grew both in enthusiasm and size as the evening proceeded, till finally when the Lieut.-Governor left his car to join in the singing of the National Anthem, the scene was one not easily to be forgotten.

The entertainment for Christmas Day was more in the form of general festivities than any set programme, and took place, for the most part, during dinner. At intervals the Elizabethan Quartet, in period costumes, sang carols. The great event of the evening, however, was the bringing in of the Boar's Head, which was done with faithful regard for tradition. Led by the Jester, the little procession made the round of the tables for all to see, the Steward carring his staff of office, the pages and the chef with his prize, all the while singing the old 'Boar's Head' carol.

The remainder of the programme included a most successful play, 'Mr. Wardle's Christmas Party,' adapted from the 'Pickwick Papers,' one more performance of the Chester Mysteries, another concert of Christmas music, and a concert of carols given by the Quartet. This latter concert was really interesting from a historical point of view, since the selections were drawn from carols covering a period from the 15th century to the present day.

On New Year's Eve there were special wassailing carols and hogmanay carols, and, as a fitting close, Twelfth-Night Revels on the evening of January 5.

PARIS

During the past weeks attention was chiefly called by numerous first performances of symphonic music. In spite of the current apprehensions as to the unattractiveness of modern music for the public at large, our concert associations feel more and more the necessity of varying their programmes with new items. A short account of some of the latter will be the object of these lines. Beginning with the Colonne Association, under the direction of Gabriel Pierné, we note the second Suite in C, by Enesco, the well-known violinist. Composed in 1915, this work is not particularly novel, but is endowed with honest lyricism and sound architecture. R. Blin is responsible for an orchestral suite, 'En Champagne,' composed in 1917 while he was fighting on the French battle-front. Reacting against the warlike atmosphere around him, the composer depicts calm country scenes, the twilight on the fields, the awakening of Nature. His music sounds sincere in intention, and is well scored.

Madame Béclard-d'Harcourt presented a cycle of Indian popular melodies collected at the Andes, arranged by herself. They are exquisite specimens of South-American folk-music. Madame M. Grey sang them with perfect art, and they met with popular success. Of Piriou's symphonic Suite entitled 'Au Pays de Kômor,' and based on the poem by Leconte de Lisle, only a fragment, 'In the Tempest,' was performed for the time being. It aims at depicting the tragic beauty of a storm on the coast of Brittany. The music is vigorous and solidly built, and lacks neither colour nor picturesqueness.

At the Lamoureux Concerts was performed 'Trois Chansons à dire,' by R. Charpentier, composed for female vocal trio with orchestral accompaniment. These songs testify to the author's musical temperament. At times they take a popular turn; in other passages the musician indulges in concise but ingenious symphonic developments. They were expressively sung by Mesdames Malnory, Vhita, and Taskin. Delannoy's 'Ballade,' inspired by MacOrlan's novel 'La Chiourme,' is elegant, endowed with a personal turn, and soberly expressed.

At the Pasdeloup Concerts, conducted by Rhéne-Baton, we have had Capdevielle's symphonic poem 'Evocations de l'Averne,' which, following Virgil and Homer, leads us to the gates of Hades. The piece is frankly of a dramatic character and the composer shows considerable gifts in that direction. A Phantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, by Paul Le Flem, efficiently performed by Madame Zurfluh-Tenroc, brought forward a genuine musical personality. M. Le Flem is a faithful Breton, and his music is deeply impregnated with the spirit of the popular art of that interesting French province.

As in past years Walther Straram inaugurated at the Champs-Elysées Theatre a series of sixteen weekly symphonic concerts at which, along with works drawn from all epochs of musical history, the claims of modern music are well recognised. Since their foundation, only a few years ago, the Straram Concerts may justly claim to have attained a high degree of perfection in the study and the execution of their varied programmes. The latter are composed in a spirit of liberal eclecticism over which presides the keen musical intelligence of the chief. The first novelty presented was a Pianoforte Concerto by D. Latzarus. It is in the classic form, giving the chief part to the soloist. The slow movement is pregnant with emotional qualities, and the first and last movements are of a brilliant and rhythmic character. I was unable to attend the two subsequent concerts, at which first performances were given of a 'Suite Valaque,' by the Rumanian composer F. Lazar, and three 'Pastorales' by J. Rivier.

ITALY

MILAN

One-act operas seem to be in vogue at present, and an addition to the list was Lattuada's 'Le Preziose Ridicole,' presented at La Scala on a recent Saturday night for the first time. The libretto is taken from Molière's 'Les Précieuses Ridicules.'

The composer is still a very young man, and besides being armed with unbounded enthusiasm, possesses no mean courage (his new setting of 'Don Giovanni' is to be premiered at the San Carlo of Naples in a week or so). The opera is preceded by an overture sketched on themes later developed in the vocal or instrumental score, with the result that one gains the impression either of an opera based on the motives of a symphony, or a potpourri (the Overture) orchestral arrangement taken from the opera.

It is a difficult work to sum up with certainty, and one is inclined to postpone judgment. There are pages of undoubted loveliness and charm, and yet one cannot dismiss a sort of anxiety for the general effect. The stage movement is uncertain, and in the hands of any but a good producer would drag the opera into open ridicule. As it is, there are at least two sections which should most decidedly be cut. This carefully attended to, one would not hesitate to give unstinted praise and approval. There are portions strongly reminiscent of Bach, Handel, and Pergolesi, but not to the extent of borrowing. The music is original, and achieves the end of a clever caricature. The instrumentation shows a lack of knowledge of brass effect, if we may judge from the failure of certain mock pompous passages that on paper look splendid.

Mafalda Favero and Ebe Stignani sang respectively the rôles of Madelon and Cathos; Gorgibus was well, if a little heavily, interpreted by Baccaloni; and as La Grange and Croissy, Venturini and Baracchi were well placed. The Polish tenor Jan Kiepura sang the more important part of Mascarille, but forced matters, both in singing and acting. More discreet was Faticanti as Jodelet. Santini conducted, and he and the composer were the recipients of much applause.

'Le Preziose Ridicole' was followed by 'Casanova a Venezia,' a new ballet by Adami and Pick-Mangiagalli, dealing with the various amorous incidents of the famous gallant's career in Venice. Like 'Vecchio Milano,' the ballet which was produced here last year, 'Casanova' more nearly approaches pantomime than the traditional Russian Ballet. The principal figure is an actor, and not a dancer, and, as the story revolves round him, there is more miming than dancing. One is at a loss to know whether the choreographer, the same in both ballets, is trying to create a new form or if he is simply incapable of developing an original theme on traditional lines. The result, however, is far from uninteresting. Indeed, to many a layman it will prove better entertainment than the classic dance, for the simple reason that it is possible to include a dramatic figure, and is easier to follow. That is speaking of the form. As an individual work of art, 'Casanova a Venezia' has no secure foundation, either musical or choreographic. The story abounds in interest, but the recent appearance of a cinema film dramatising the story is too fresh in people's minds to allow Signor Adami to 'get away with' his extensive borrowings of another's ideas.

'Boris Godounov,' with a new protagonist in the person of Rossi-Morelli, has been given a number of times, and during the next week or so we are promised Ravel's 'Spanish Hour.' Puccini's 'Il Tabarro,' one of the three one-Act operas that form the Trittico, has been played also, with marked success. One is inclined to rank this short work as among Puccini's best things.

At Rome the Royal Opera has been having a good deal of Mascagni, with his 'L'amico Fritz' and 'Cavalleria.' The performances have been marked by the patronage of the young Princesses Giovanna and Mafalda, whose presence has stirred many of the city's youth into a seeming interest in opera. The principal singers have been Claudia Muzio, Bertana, Franci, Lauri Volpi, and Stracciari. Verdi was represented by his worst opera, 'Traviata,' and Bellini by his most sentimental, 'Norma.'

I regret to report that Toti Dal Monte, after her first performance of 'Il Re,' last month's novelty, was taken seriously ill, and has now gone to the Riviera to recuperate. It will probably be six months before she will sing again. Her part in 'Il Re' was taken by Mercédes Capsir after a delay of some twenty days. Though less brilliant than Dal Monte, Capsir is a better actress, and sustained the rôle very creditably. The opera improves with acquaintance, and continues to attract good houses.

CHARLES D'IF.

TORONTO

This (January) has been an eventful month for music. After an absence of many years, opera again tried its fortune under the ambitious auspices of the American Opera Company. This well-equipped organization from the Rochester School of Music (or, rather, the Eastman School, as it was founded by Mr. Eastman) is directed by Mr. Vladimir Rosing, who has as associates Mr. Campbell McInnes (for diction) and Mr. Frank St. Leger (for orchestra). We were unexpectedly impressed with the taste and unusual vocal efficiency shown in presentations of 'Faust,' 'Figaro,' and 'Butterfly.' In matters of clean-cut utterance and emotional restraint the performances were worthy of the best opera traditions, particularly in choral work. And, happily, there were no 'stars.'

Toronto was favoured with another surprise—an evening of truly remarkable singing by the Prague Teachers' Chorus, under Prof. Metod Dolezil. It is almost impossible to imagine more highly trained singers from a true standard of musicianship, particularly as to range and technique. Works, many of them entirely unknown here, by Smetana, Jan Kunc, J. B. Foerster, and Fricker constituted a most interesting programme.

The Philharmonic concert drew large houses for a joint recital by Florence Austral, Paul Kochanski, and John Amadio; and for the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, the latter brilliantly conducted by Mr. Victor Kolar, assistant to Mr. Gabrilowitsch, who is on holiday. Disappointment in the failure of Sir Thomas Beecham to appear as guest-conductor was amply offset by Mr. Kolar's magnetism and the vigorous originality shown in his reading of the Tchaikovsky fifth Symphony.

Other outstanding events include the impeccable Roland Hayes in a typical programme—he sang to a packed house, and was in perfect voice; Mischa Heifetz in a brilliant and commanding programme, given with his customary magnificent reserve, Dr. Ernest Macmillan directing the Toronto Conservatory Choir and Orchestra in the Christmas Oratorio; and Dr. Orr Kunits conducting the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in some of its best work this season—strangely enough, the Tchaikovsky fifth again.

And now we are quiet again, waiting eagerly for the Mendelssohn Choir Festival. There will be four concerts, but we fear not nearly enough seats to accommodate the applicants. Again we are to welcome Mr. Fritz Reiner and the Cincinnati Symphony.

VIENNA

THE NEW SITUATION AT THE STAATSOPER

The Vienna Opera occupies a unique position among the operatic theatres of the world. Nowhere else is the attention and public interest equally centred in an operatic theatre. There can be no comparison, in this respect, with London, where the short operatic season is a passing episode within each musical year; or with New York, where operatic activity is left to the initiative and taste of a small wealthy circle; nor, indeed, with Paris—for although the French government contributes its share (and a rather meagre one) to the maintenance of its two opera houses, they are a social affair rather than a vital factor in the public life of the city. At Vienna, where the government covers the entire cost of the two State theatres, and where, consequently, the State Opera is financially supported by each individual citizen, there is a unique situation. The ardour, even passionate interest, with which all Viennese citizens follow the reports and activities of the Staatsoper and its changing fortunes, cannot perhaps be conceived by anyone not thoroughly familiar with local conditions and mentality. This impoverished country clings to its State Opera with a grim determination, as to its last great possession saved from a great and mighty past. It is the merit of Franz Schalk that the standard of the house has not been lowered, like that of other and wealthier opera houses—indeed, it has improved during the trying post-war period—so that Vienna's Staatsoper may now be considered by far the best of all German-speaking opera houses, if not the best in Europe—even though musical Vienna is otherwise, frankly speaking, but a shadow of its past.

Amid almost feverish interest on the part of the general public, the Staatsoper has recently passed through a long-awaited crisis. The outcome was the appointment of a new director in the person of Clemens Krauss, who will assume the post with the beginning of the new season. This means the retirement of Schalk from a position which he has occupied for eleven years, and which no one had expected him to leave within the next few years. Schalk will, however, remain as guest-conductor, and many think that the directoral rôle of the resourceful man is but temporarily finished.

Clemens Krauss, at any rate, undertakes no light job. With Strauss, Schalk, and Furtwängler as guest-conductors beside him, and with Bruno Walter as a silent candidate at his back, he faces a difficult task. Krauss, a Viennese by birth, has proved his abilities as a conductor at the Staatsoper in his youth; and his experiences at Frankfort, where he has since served as director, will be valuable to him. He undertakes to waive guest tours for the sake of constructive work at the Staatsoper, and he promises a completion of the ensemble, and some interesting novelties. This is important in view of the present situation; the current season has been almost unparalleled in the history of the house for its lack of new works. With half of the season passed, the Staatsoper has so far placed to its credit one single novelty—Rabaud's innocent and mildly entertaining opera 'Marouf,' the production of which was less an artistic necessity than an act of courtesy towards the French government, in recognition of the Vienna Opera's successful visit there last year. Ravel's 'L'enfant et les sortilèges' is promised as the second, and so far only, novelty of the season; a meagre harvest.

FURTWÄNGLER

Furtwängler, having definitely declined the directorship of the Vienna Opera (a post so coveted by almost every great German conductor) in favour of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, has still retained his activities as director of the Vienna Philharmonic concerts. Vienna, though disappointed, has not allowed his tremendous popularity to suffer from the incident. The Philharmonic concerts are completely sold out, and Furtwängler's name remains a magnet also with the choral concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, which he shares with Robert Heger. From Furtwängler the Philharmonic subscribers accept even modern music, and might accept even ultra-radical works if he chose to produce them. There is nothing that Furtwängler might not risk here, and it is, indeed, deplorable that he does not give his Vienna audiences the same strong musical food which he presents to Berlin. Is it respect for the proverbially conservative Philharmonic genius loci, or merely lack of time for rehearsals? Debussy's 'Nocturnes'—two of them only, 'Les Sirènes' being omitted for want of a chorus—are as far afield as Furtwängler has this season gone in the way of modernism. For the balance, he has presented familiar classic and romantic works, albeit with a perfection that made them appear new and surprising.

In the Gesellschaft concerts, Furtwängler has given a beautiful production of the 'St. Matthew' Passion—a centenary performance, so to say. Just two hundred years ago, the Passion was first heard at Leipsic—an unassuming 'occasional' composition for Easter Week, presented with a modest handful of artists at St. Thomas's Church; while at the same hour Leipsic's general interest centred upon the première of a new Passion by one Gottlieb Fröbel, at the New Church. A century later, Mendelssohn began the Bach renaissance with his historical performances of the 'St. Matthew' Passion; and again a hundred years later, a crowded hall at Vienna listened attentively to the gigantic work in Furtwängler's marvellous performance. Karl Erb was the Narrator—the most perfect of Bach singers to-day, impeccable in style and intense expression.

ROBERT HEGER'S NEW SYMPHONY

Robert Heger, well known to Covent Garden audiences for several seasons past, is acknowledged here as a musician of great merit and value. In his quiet, unassuming, sincere way he has gradually arrived at an important position in the musical life of the city. But his importance as conductor both at the Staatsoper and Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde is a sword that cuts both ways. That a fine conductor could also be a composer of worth seems still inconceivable to the majority reminiscent of the malicious bon mot concerning 'Kapellmeistermusik.' In the music of a composing conductor, we are all too prone to look for plagiarisms, and those determined to find them will discover them everywhere. It bespeaks Heger's prestige and popularity that such reminiscence-hunting was waived for the première of his second Symphony. Habitual explorers disagreed whether Strauss, Bruckner, or Mahler had inspired this or that passage, but the dissension within so wide a radius was sufficient evidence for Heger's originality, and the general public accepted the Symphony with even more readiness than Heger's big choral work 'A Song of Peace,' which we heard last season.

The Symphony is in four movements, with varying moods and strong, well-calculated contrasts, yet united and rounded out, as it were, through one theme which goes all through the work and recurs in ever new shapes and disguises. 'Fantasia seriosa,' 'Scherzo furioso,' 'Notturno,' and 'Perpetuum mobile' are the inscriptions of the four portions, and such wide scope of moods offers Heger splendid opportunities. He has the mastery of his craft, proving it in an imposing thematic and contrapuntal workmanship; he scores brilliantly, with imagination and wit, and with an infinite sense of colour. Above all, he speaks the language of a cultured musician, and with obvious sincerity. Heger's romanticism is free from sentimentality, his modernism is never strained, and always convincing. Indeed, Heger redeems, with this piece, the much accused 'composing Kapellmeister'—for perhaps only one so perfectly associated with the orchestral apparatus and so familiar with its possibilities could write a piece so brilliantly effective as the dazzling, electrifying 'Perpetuum mobile.' The success of the Symphony was great, and Heger received an ovation.

Paul Bechert.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

Lawrence Walker, on January 6, at Belfast. Dr. Walker was born at Gloucester about sixty-seven years ago, but at a very early age he came to Armagh, so that he was always regarded, and indeed regarded himself, as an Irishman. Like many good musicians he received his training in a cathedral, being in the Armagh choir until his voice broke. In those days he won considerable renown as a solo singer, and was in great demand at concerts in the neighbouring towns. At the age of seventeen he was appointed organist of Carrickfergus Parish Church, and shortly afterwards of St. James's Church, Belfast—a position which he held for about forty years. Here he laboured unceasingly to raise the standard of Church music. For many years Dr. Walker was lecturer at Queen's University, Belfast, where his teaching was a delight and an inspiration. He had a first-class brain, and his analysis of a work was always clear. But there are two respects in which Dr. Walker was pre-eminent—as a pianist and as a pioneer, locally, in chamber music. From Bach to Ravel he played everything, but neither in this nor in any other branch of his music would he stoop to the cheap or the meretricious. Early in life he instituted a series of chamber concerts, which continued up to the time of the war. These concerts, in their early days, attracted only a small number of music-lovers, but that small number will always remember with gratitude the opportunity, otherwise denied, of hearing great music well performed. Many, like the present writer, owe their first introduction to perfection in music to hearing the Brodsky Quartet, who were annual visitors, play Mozart and Beethoven at these concerts. The inevitable financial loss was borne by Dr. Walker. Any review, however brief, of his life must lay stress on his continual and self-sacrificing efforts to help to raise the status of the musical profession. He was the founder, and first hon. secretary, of the Ulster branch of the I.S.M. and president, since its inception, of the Ulster Society of Organists and Choirmasters. When the Society of Professional Musicians in Ulster was inaugurated (for private reasons, he refused the presidency) he became vice-president, and held that post up till his death. Musical Ulster takes leave of its leader with respect, gratitude, and affection. G. H. FitzSimons.

Sylvester Smith, on January 21, at Belfast. He was born at Chilwell, Nottingham, in 1863, and was a soloist in the local church at the age of six, when he sang Spohr's 'As pants the hart.' Taking up the study of the violin while still a boy, he later played among the first violins in the Leicester Opera House. Singing, however, claimed him ultimately, and he enjoyed much success as a tenor on the concert-platform and in oratorio. He declined several invitations to join various opera companies, preferring to make business his main occupation. He removed to Belfast in 1889, and his valuable work for the Ulster Amateur Operatic Society, and a host of other musical enterprises in Northern Ireland, will be long and gratefully remembered.

Siegfried Ochs, at Berlin, on February 6, aged seventy. He founded the Berlin Philharmonic Choir forty-seven years ago, and worked indefatigably as its trainer until its dissolution in 1920. Subsequently he conducted the choral class at the Berlin High School. He did much to popularise Bach's music, and also introduced to Berlin a good deal of British music. He wrote a comic opera, 'In the Name of the Law,' an autobiography, and several books on choral society work.

Minnie Hauck (Baroness von Hesse-Wartegg), at Lucerne, on February 6. Born at New York, on November 16, 1852, of German parentage, she began her career as a singer at a concert at New Orleans when about thirteen years of age. She made her debut on the lyric stage three years later at New York, playing Amina in 'La Sonnambula.' She made her appearance at Covent Garden in 1868, and thenceforward enjoyed a brilliant career.

Henry William Brooke, in London, on January 23. He entered the firm of Novello & Co. in 1873, and became a partner on the retirement of Henry Littleton in 1887. He was associated with the manufacturing side of the business, of which he remained in active control until a few weeks before his death. Mr. Brooke was a Fellow of the Royal Philharmonic Society, and a supporter for many years of the Royal Choral Society.

F. G. M. Ogbourne, on January 9, at the Charterhouse, where he was one of the Brothers. He was born in 1851, and studied the organ under E. H. Thorne and other teachers. After holding various important London appointments he went to St. Andrew's, Holborn, in 1903, remaining there till 1925. He was a well-known recitalist, and was for many years professor of the organ at Trinity College.

David Frame Flint, at Glasgow. He was organist and choirmaster of Hillhead Congregational Church, a well-known pianoforte merchant, past-president of the Glasgow Society of Organists, son of the late W. F. Frame who was in his (pre-Lauder) day Scotland's favourite comedian.

Helen Whomes, at Bexley Heath, on January 30, aged fifty-two. She was one of the directors of the firm of Whomes, Ltd., and an excellent musician. Until recently she was the organist of Christ Church, Bexley Heath.

Gustave van der Velde, accidentally, from coal-gas poisoning, at Brighton, on January 14, aged seventy-eight. He had been professor of the violoncello at Brighton School of Music for about thirty years.

Marion Richardson, at Edinburgh. Well-known as a concert and opera singer, and singing teacher, daughter of the composer of the favourite song 'Mary' ('Kind, kind, and gentle is she').

H. Everitt Loseby, at Dundee; sometime musical director at His Majesty's Theatre, Dundee, and prominent as a violin teacher.

In common with (apparently) the entire press of this country, we were misinformed concerning the late Mr. Goldschmidt, whose obituary appeared in our February number. It was there stated that he was a pianist, but one of his personal friends tells us that he held an official legal post, and was not a musician. The confusion probably arose through similarity of names, his being Otto, after his father, but preceded by Walter.

Miscellaneous

An interesting concert will take place on Tuesday, March 5, at 8 p.m. at the Royal College of Music, Prince Consort Road, S.W., by kind permission of the Director and Council, when Handel's cantata 'L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso' will be revived, with its original orchestration, under the direction of Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott. The soloists will be Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Mary Morris, Mr. Percy Manchester, and Mr. George Pizzey, and the choruses will be sung by the Oriana Madrigal Society Choir, accompanied by a special orchestra with harpsichord and organ. The concert is being held under the auspices of the Oriana Madrigal Society and the Kensington Music Club, and those interested can obtain invitations and further particulars from the hon. secretary, K.M.C., Miss Edna Grasemann, 25, Campden House Chambers, Sheffield Terrace, W. 8 (telephone: Park 2572).

The group of singers who recently began activities under the title of 'The London Singers' have discovered that there is already a quartet party bearing that name. They will therefore be known hereafter as 'The London Vocal Quintet.' A change of personnel has also taken place, and the Quintet now consists of Mesdames Beatrice Hughes-Pope, Gladys Currie, Gwen Minshull, Messrs. Stanley Parsons and Eustace Belham. The repertory will be of old and modern madrigals, folk-songs, and part-songs. The secretary is Miss Minshull, 1, Claverley Grove, N.3.

Mr. Walter Yeomans will give the members of the South-East London Recorded Music Society a talk on the Brandenburg Concertos on March 11, at Sanders's Café, High Street, Lewisham, with gramophone illustrations. Further particulars from the secretary, Mr. V. Webling, 52, Winn Road, S.E.12.

DISTINGUISHED PIANO MUSIC

IT is in the memory of many musicians that when ERNEST AUSTIN first entered the ranks of British Composers, he had a fine tilt, in the Morning Post, at the Examining Institutions about their use of Foreign music, and in one case instanced a Syllabus, under Royal Patronage, with 100% foreign piano music. His protest raised a hornet's nest, and he was soundly rebuked for his impudence. But he had put the case so well that even those who were against him in practice were with him in principle. And year by year, until the War, he persistently gave some ugly figures about the use of foreign Piano music in this Country. Then, in a flash of national pride, the musical-conscience of Teachers was suddenly aroused in favour of British music. "Austin's Annual," as his protest was called, was no longer needed.

From the first I doggedly published Ernest Austin's Educational Music, and it is gratifying to know he is now placed in the front rank of British Composers in that branch of Composition. Among other music of his I published his "SONATINAS ON NATIONAL AIRS," which I want—by this advertisement—to bring to the notice of the Teachers of the younger generation. One arresting opinion of them is quoted below:—

> "It is always a matter of surprise that good ideas remain so long unthought of. Just why nobody thought of making Mr. ERNEST AUSTIN'S ingenious experiment sooner is certainly a matter for wonder, now that one has been found to give us these Sonatinas as a fait accompli. This notion of taking some of our splendid heritage of national tunes and elaborating them into complete movements, whereby pupils can be made easily to perceive and appreciate the significance of extended musical form and constructive device, is surely an excellent one which must commend itself to all who are interested in training, not only the technique of the rising generation, but also their faculties of musical appreciation. Furthermore, anybody who has had the rare feeling of musical patriotism must feel it something of a tragedy that our young musicians have hitherto been almost exclusively fed upon the stock-pot foreign matter of the average instruction- and exercise-book: the old worn-out studies of the last two or three generations, or simplified (usually colourless) versions of the classics; while our own truly national music, the spontaneous and characteristic utterance of our own people, has lain practically untouched as a means of education and the development of national musical feeling."—E. Douglas Tayler.

In his treatment of these National Airs he resorted to very individual devices, interspersing and weaving melodic and rhythmic ideas into the texture and round about the various tunes. It was said by one critic that he did this so well that it was difficult to tell where the folk-tune ended and the composer's own additions began. The Sonatinas are all designed to give the utmost technical value coupled with the attractive melodic interest of the themes.

Since their publication many efforts of imitation have been made, but these Sonatinas by Ernest Austin stand four-square and serve the best purposes of every thorough and artistic Teacher.

"Finger Magic"

HOW THE MASTER MUSICIAN IS MADE.

"I have been reading a little booklet which I have termed 'Finger Magic,' and I would very much like to place this book in the hands of every pianist, violinist, and 'cellist in the Kingdom.

"We all know that the secret of the virtuosi does not consist in the amount of time they expend in instrumental practice—one recently stated that he often does not touch the instrument for a week, and another has affirmed that musicians are positively superstitious about practice. The secret of the success of the great masters must therefore be looked for in another direction than in the capacity for hard grinding practice on orthodox lines, and I have been experimenting with a system which may well prove to be a solution, or at any rate to a large extent.

"The system to which I refer develops the hands not by practice in the ordinary sense, but by a series of exercises, based on sound psychological as well as physiological laws, and the descriptive booklet, issued by the Cowling Institute, contains some astonishing letters from musicians which would convince me, even if not backed up by my own experience, that the quickest and easiest way to develop the strength and flexibility of the wrist and fingers so essential to pianists, violinists, and 'cellists is to perform the operation away from the instrument, when the mind can be centred upon that object alone.

"I anticipate that within a measurable period the knowledge contained in this little booklet, and in the lessons given by the Cowling Institute, will form part of the curriculum of every teacher and be a necessary equipment of every violinist, 'cellist, and pianist."—

ERNEST JAY, F.R.C.O.

NOTE.—The booklet referred to above may be obtained free of all cost on application to Secretary, T., Cowling Institute, 71, Albion House, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1.

Can YOU play without music?

MEMORISING is no longer a "gift" with the favoured few, but is an established fact with thousands of people who have taken my short Correspondence Course and gained complete mastery over this dreaded weakness. As one student writes: "It is indeed the 'Master-Method.'" If you can play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ, send without delay for my Free Booklet on the all-absorbing subject of memory-playing.

MASTER-METHOD OF MEMORY-PLAYING

Please state whether you play the Piano, Violin, 'Cello, or Organ, and if a moderate or advanced player.

REGINALD FOORT, F.R.C.O.

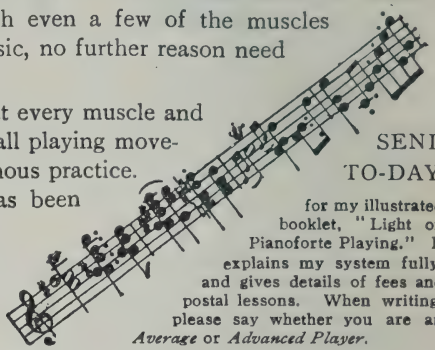
The Pianist's Hands

The Times says: "The excellence of Mr. Macdonald Smith's methods has been abundantly proved."

PREVALENT among pianists is the idea that you cannot play well unless you have a special sort of hand; this is a mistake. It is obvious, however, that the hands must be in perfect condition, otherwise the many technical difficulties to be overcome will be found insuperable. For a pianist every single muscle of the hands and arms must move the instant it is required to do so, and if this fails to be the case with even a few of the muscles brought into play in any complicated passage of music, no further reason need be sought to account for failure.

Let the "From Brain to Keyboard" System perfect every muscle and nerve in your hands and give you instant control over all playing movements without any of the usual drudgery and monotonous practice. Why not learn something about the System that has been used by many of our eminent musicians.



SEND TO-DAY

for my illustrated booklet, "Light on Pianoforte Playing." It explains my system fully, and gives details of fees and postal lessons. When writing, please say whether you are an Average or Advanced Player.

LONDON MATRICULATION
PREPARATION BY CORRESPONDENCE

On a thoroughly individual system, ensuring to each Student the closest care and attention.

The following are a few extracts from successful pupils' letters:—

"The way you anticipated the form which the questions asked at the examination would take (and in some cases the actual questions themselves), is wonderful."

"This agreeable result is due to your skilful tuition, and to the skill and patience of yourself and staff I owe very much."

"I much appreciated all the papers you set me, and all the interesting notes without which I should most probably have failed."

TECHNIQUE AND EXPRESSION IN PIANOFORTE PLAYING BY FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

EXTRACT FROM PREFACE

In the course of my experience as a teacher of the pianoforte, an experience extending over many years, certain ideas have from time to time suggested themselves to me which have proved useful—to myself, as enabling me to express more clearly that which I desired my pupils to understand, and to my pupils, as tending to facilitate their comprehension of the various difficulties they have had to encounter, at the same time leading them to perceive the most practical means of overcoming them, and thus accelerating their general rate of progress.

These suggestions relate to both the mechanical and intellectual sides of the study of pianoforte-playing, or briefly, to Technique and Expression, the chief matters implied by the first of these terms being the production of various qualities of tone, the choice of suitable fingering, and the best methods of attacking certain difficulties; while the second, which may perhaps be more aptly designated the means of expression, includes rhythm, phrasing, variety and gradation of tone, the use of the pedals, et cætera.

BERLIOZ: A POSTSCRIPT TO A DISCUSSION

By M.-D. Calvocoressi

There has been of late a good deal of controversy on Berlioz. Hence this postscript, written not with the idea that it (or any other) might close the discussion, but with the firm conviction that, fifty or a hundred years hence, the same discussions will still be cropping up, and similar postscripts will perhaps be written.

Berlioz is the only composer of any magnitude whose music has so long remained a bone of contention. The best way to account for this singular case is, I think, to consider carefully the sum and substance of the objections offered to this music. These are definite enough, but as a rule have been stated rather too summarily. One of the very few writers who have taken the trouble to make a full case against Berlioz is the French critic Jean Marnold ('Hector Berlioz, Musicien,' in the Mercure de France, January-February, 1905). As his essay appears to have remained unnoticed here, and has not been republished in volume form, I shall quote, in brief, its main points.

'Berlioz's harmonies are dull and clumsy. He hears his chords never as a whole, the product of certain natural affinities which determine certain necessary conditions (selection and spacing of notes, in each chord and from one to the other), but merely as a compound either of "notes," aiming at certain effects, or of "intervals," associated in order to sustain each note of a melody taken singly. His modulations are either of the stereotyped order, or haphazard and incoherent—in the latter respect, those in the Invocation to Nature in "La Damnation de Faust" are a case in point.

'All this does not mean that "he did not know how to write." Indeed, at the age of twenty-seven (when he wrote the "Symphonie Fantastique") he showed far greater expertness than Wagner at twenty-eight (at the time of writing the "Flying Dutchman"). It is simply that he was quite devoid of the sense of harmony. He was, first and last, a monodist. He could and did create superb examples of melody, but had no sense of the beauty and logic of the polyphony derived from melody; nor did the affinities and possibilities of his melodies interest him: he saw none and sought for none. Hence these melodies remain sterile so far as concerns the working out, the modelling of the work into a whole. A case in point is the "Dies Iræ" in the "Requiem," which consists of separate slices artificially assembled, without any trace of a consistent plan.

'Berlioz could neither create logical musical form nor avail himself of existing forms with any degree of surety and originality; see, for instance, the looseness of the "varied rondo" form in the "King Lear" and "Benvenuto Cellini" Overtures. The Offertory in the "Requiem"—which is, all told, one of his finest inspirations—consists merely of two alternating melodies, with a central trio and a coda. The only forms he used freely are those of the Minuet, the Scherzo, the Andante, and the March.'

Let us acknowledge forthwith that all strictures against Berlioz (apart from that concerning form, a point as to which a deadlock is reached, but including that which would deny him the gift of significant melodic invention) have been emphatically challenged. There are many competent and sensitive judges (critics, practising musicians of all orders, and plain listeners) who have never felt any poverty or clumsiness in Berlioz's music; so that we may well hesitate before deciding one way or the other. But what we can say without hesitation is that there is no other composer on whose music the same kind of strictures could crop up with unabated strength after nearly a century of discussion (for what Ravel said of Berlioz this very year 1929 is substantially the same as Marnold was saying in 1905). And it is not in the least—as one eager defender of Berlioz, Mr. Ernest Newman, would have us believe—a case of conventional theory versus live, original practice. No critic of Berlioz is adducing school rules in support of his arguments. Nor should we overlook the fact that the harmonies and modulations of the most unconventional innovators—Liszt, Moussorgsky, Debussy, Ravel, and others—are accepted as a matter of course, quite apart from references to theory. More generally speaking, when music remains an object of interest sixty years after its composer's death, a critic suddenly questioning the adequacy of its harmonies and modulations (I leave the matter of form alone for the time being) would probably stand in a state of splendid isolation.

Indeed, it is very curious how the words 'Berlioz is the only musician who . . .' are bound to run through every debate on him. Ravel declares that 'history shows no other example of a composer so thoroughly devoid of harmonic sense.' Mr. Ernest Newman describes Berlioz as 'a composer whose mind worked along lines very different from those of any other composer.' Dr. Buck (see The Dominant, February, 1929) considers that Berlioz's ideas have never become 'current coinage' in the musical world—in which respect he is certainly unique among composers of his calibre. The list could be made much longer; and it will be noticed that I was compelled to start with the very same words.

Let us, then, deal with him as with an exception pure and simple; but even then he must stand or fall, broadly speaking, by the same standards as all composers—it is impossible to imagine standards applying to one composer and to no other. This does not mean, however, that we shall not be able to see light in his case.

A remarkable fact is that, with a very few exceptions, both his admirers and detractors agree on one point: the inadequacy of his form considered from the purely musical angle. The deadlock to which I have alluded is reached only when the former allege that it does not matter in the least, and the latter that it makes all the difference in the world. Form, when all is said and done, merely means consistency and continuity of interest—not the application of certain school rules. Therefore the objection, if justified, is a very serious one. Again, we may note that Berlioz is the one composer against whose music it crops up persistently, and from all quarters (against Liszt it is put forward only by a small number of confirmed opponents; and Richard Strauss has partisans who contend that his tone-poems make sense from the purely musical point of view).

Let us consider the stand taken by the upholders of the notion that music—I mean, of course, instrumental music intended for the concert platform—may quite satisfactorily depend upon a programme as a prop, failing which it would collapse then and there. No one has asserted so far that the relation of a programme to a tone-poem could be that of the words to the music in a song, an opera, or an oratorio, except Mr. Newman, who writes (Musical Times, November, 1911), 'What is the difference between Schumann telling us that his subject is "Faust" by the device of making Faust and Margaret sing definite words and Liszt telling us that his subject is "Faust" by the device of printing that word on his title-page?' This, in my opinion, amounts practically to a reductio ad absurdum, as I have attempted to show in articles on programme-music. But to say of Berlioz's music that its comprehension depends upon a knowledge of its literary associations amounts to practically the same thing. That most of his admirers should be ready to grant the point shows, I think, the weakness of the case they make.

If we were to speak of a picture or a building that calls for verbal explanations before its significance can be perceived; of a poem that has no meaning except in conjunction with certain designs illustrating it; or of a play that is unintelligible apart from the music associated with it, the absurdity would be patent forthwith. But in the matter of programme-music, people are found to accept, without bating an eyelid, the notion of an equally incongruous co-operation of the music and the programme.

It is true that this plea has been put forward on behalf of no other music than Berlioz's, and that no claim has been made that it may be understood as music pure and simple—music that carries its own justification, as every work of art must do, in accordance with its own governing principles and chosen mediums.

So far the positive results of our inquiry are: That an enormous majority agree as to the weakness and inconsistency of Berlioz's form; that at any time a number of competent judges are to be found who hold that his harmonic and modulatory procedure is equally weak and inconsistent; but that in the past and in the present one finds a number of competent judges for whom Berlioz's music carries conviction, and who, accordingly, either challenge the above strictures or brush them contemptuously aside.

Assuming—as is only reasonable—that there is a measure of truth in the criticisms so persistently levelled at Berlioz's harmony, modulation, and form, it becomes possible to describe him—without unfairness, I think—as a composer in whose make-up certain fundamentals were lacking. He is, so to speak, in the position of a man constitutionally incapable of using certain elements, articulations, or turns of speech—of a writer who cannot master, say, the use of all tenses and conjunctions, nor assemble his sentences into paragraphs and his paragraphs into chapters. But he unquestionably had the gift of enthusiasm. His speech may be halting and his sentences disconnected: but it is vivid, and he supplements its deficiencies by pointing out the object of his enthusiasm with so much conviction that not infrequently he succeeds in convincing others.

To this end his literary activities may have helped not a little. He was endowed with an extraordinary capacity for self-advertisement and for pushing his wares. All the biographical information published during his life-time was inspired by him; most of the information published since is founded either on this inspired literature or on his even more highly sensational and fictional 'Memoirs.' How far his music, unassisted by his flaming professions of faith and declarations of revolt, could tell the tales that he is so eager to force upon us is a question that must remain unanswered. But it is only a secondary question. All these fabrications and posturings of Berlioz's (so patiently traced and convincingly exposed in the biography by Adolphe Boschot, a relentless critic and yet a keen lover of Berlioz) are part and parcel of Berlioz's individuality. While indulging in them he is as sincere (as true to himself, that is) as when in the throes of musical inspiration. We may detect fabrications and posturings in his music, too, and yet feel that even there his humanity peeps out. This, I think, is the true reason why his music endures, and one of the main reasons why criticism of it never ceases.

Even those of us who find the greater part of his output unconvincing will grant that his music reflects his nature both faithfully and strikingly. They will grant it, I think, without endorsing the notion that music is to be considered as a sort of 'portrait of the artist.' 'Try to see the man in his music' is one of the vaguest and most fallacious catchwords of musical criticism; and it is only in the narrowest most matter-of-fact sense that it applies to Berlioz. Perhaps we may even say that a little too much of the man, of the individual and exceptional elements, crop up in his work, without expanding into wider significance. Or maybe the interest of his music lies chiefly in its grasp of the emotions of life as distinct from æsthetic emotion. Those of us who feel that music is a pure art 'with a tremendous significance of its own and no relation whatever to the significance of life' (Clive Bell's definition of art) would, in this case, naturally incline to pass a good deal of Berlioz's by. If so, let us ask again if there is another composer of whom the same might be said with any semblance of justification. The reply is obvious, and the conclusion that follows is that Berlioz stands indeed as an exceptional, isolated figure in the history of music.

THE PHYSIOLOGY OF MUSICAL CRITICISM

By A. Kalisch

In four full-dress articles in the Sunday Times, and a fifth which purported to be a review of Sir Henry Hadow's 'Collected Essays,' Mr. Ernest Newman has been lamenting the absence of any definite standard in musical criticism and clamouring for the creation of what he calls a 'physiology.'

With deference, I think the word 'physiology' is an unhappy choice. Ninety-nine people out of a hundred will naturally imagine that it is a matter of nerves, brain-cells, circulation, respiration, and even of liver, but he categorically tells us that those who think thus completely misunderstand him.

I am, however, in a little doubt what it is that he does want, and I have an uneasy suspicion that he is not quite sure himself. He says he will deal with the subject more fully elsewhere, and then perhaps he will be able to enlighten us. Perhaps it does not pass the wit of the plain man to find out for himself and anticipate Mr. Newman. Let us try.

In this case the analogy of the arts cannot help us, for there is no art which does not suffer from the same disability as music, and none in which standards can be said to be definitely fixed. For instance, is there more in common between the views of the Ars Poetica of Horace and the latest utterances of the leading critics of the weekly press than there is (to use Mr. Newman's own example) between Berlioz and Ravel? Can Mr. Michael Arlen understand Matthew Arnold? Could Botticelli and Van Gogh have conversed for five minutes without quarrelling? How would our old friend Vitruvius get on with Sir Edwin Lutyens?

It would be strange indeed if music, which is probably the most fluid of all the arts, should be the first to acquire a set of fixed principles.

Mr. Newman here seems to have landed himself in a difficulty. Either he will have to say that the other arts have a complete physiology, and yet are in the same parlous state as music, or that it is impossible in any art to have such a system as that for which he longs.

How can we escape the personal equation?

Let us for the purpose of this argument grant that all Mr. Newman's complaints of the present state of musical criticism are justified. Let us admit that, as practised to-day, the work of musical critics tells the reader more about the writer, than about the composer whom they criticise. Much might be said in defence of the present system, but I will only say that Mr. Newman commits an injustice to himself, because very often he himself is the more interesting personality than the composer of whom he is writing. Why does every intelligent reader of the Sunday Times—apart from the supermen, who, as one of them told us the other day, first turn to the cricket news from Australia—immediately rush to the musical page? Is it because Mr. Newman can tell us more about a composition from the mere reading of the score by his fireside? Or because we think he has a complete 'æsthetic' of musical criticism at his finger-tips? And should we be more anxious to read him if we did know all about his apparatus criticus? Probably not, if only because in that case the element of the unexpected could be eliminated. Everyone who knew the theory could be as good as he.

Setting æsthetic theory aside for the moment, what is the alternative to the present state of affairs?

Mr. Newman objects that we do not know enough about the composers; but it seems to me rather that we are in danger of knowing too much and ending in the desperate straits of the legendary professor of a German University, who declared that it was impossible to appreciate the true inwardness of the second part of Goethe's 'Faust' without knowing exactly the totals of Goethe's washing bills in his youth and the reasons why he was often irregular in his payments. There are many of us who think that now we know enough about the state of Beethoven's digestion when he wrote the slow movement of the seventh Symphony, or his thirst when he wrote the Finale of the ninth, we know all that is likely to be useful about his reading, his friends, and his enemies. In fact, Mr. Newman does not make it clear what he wants to know, except these things which he says are irrelevant.

If Mr. Newman will cast his memory back to the days when he 'commenced author,' he will surely remember the melancholy rut into which musical criticism had fallen, when most of the writers on musical events dealt in a singularly incompetent and uninteresting way with the elements of musical grammar. It is indeed his greatest claim on us all that he was among the first to lift musical criticism, in this country at any rate, out of this same rut. It is surely a libel to say that he wants us to return to the old pedantries. It may be that we do not particularly care to know how Beethoven's last Sonatas affect Mr. A or Mr. B, but it is surely more interesting than to be told in a soulless professional way that in spite of many arbitrary eccentricities, the 'pedal points in the Sonata Op. 111 are treated with consummate skill.' It is unfortunately true that much of the appreciation of music in these days is sad stuff, but it is surely better than that. But there seems to be no alternative other than that of dwelling on 'personal reactions'; and the sum of the matter is that we must wait and see till Mr. Newman tells us.

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

Two readers ask me to discuss a couple of books. Reader A is enthusiastic about Mr. Colles's 'Voice and Verse,'* and feels sure I shall agree with its main thesis. B sends me a copy of what is something of a miracle in these days of expensive books—a 'History of Music,' by Prof. Buck, costing (hold tight!) sixpence.†

In regard to 'Voice and Verse' I am going to disappoint my correspondent by disagreeing with the author's chief point. Judging from the numerous reviews of the book, I am in a minority of one, so my opinion really counts for little or nothing. But I have been asked to say my puny say, and nothing can now stop me. Moreover, I have for many years been in a state of monotonous agreement with almost every word of Mr. Colles's; a friendly tilt will be a diversion for me, and will not be taken amiss by him.

As a rule, to dissent from an author's premise and main conclusion is to condemn his book. 'Voice and Verse' provides us with an exception, for I read it with lively enjoyment and (I hope) with profit, in spite of remaining unconvinced by its principal argument. Here is the thesis with which Mr. Colles sets out:

> 'That music is based . . . on human impulses finding expression through the voice and answering to human needs which vary with circumstances; that instrumental music is merely an extension of vocal music. At whatever stage we take the European development of the art of music we find its composers incorporating in their instrumental music their experience of vocal music. Every one of the recognised instrumental forms exhibits the process, and it is not outgrown as the forms mature. Rather it sinks deeper as the purely instrumental characteristics grow stronger.'

As a general statement this may be true, but it is not all the truth. In his emotional crises primitive man was of course vocal rather than instrumental, for the good reason that his voice was usually the only instrument handy at the moment. But we may be sure that he had his moments with contraptions made from hollow shells and other sonorous bodies, stretched ligaments, cow-horns, and drums of sorts. Much was no doubt done with sizable bones (of a recently-vanquished enemy for choice) beaten on broad-bladed weapons—the marrow-bones and cleavers of a later period. When Bully Bottom said, 'I have a reasonable good ear in music; let us have the tongs and bones!' he was joining hands with the early Briton. Moreover, despite the fact that much dancing was accompanied with song, it is pretty certain that rude contrivances of percussion were used as much. All the early advantages were on the side of the voice, of course, but instrumental music was a fair second, or what becomes of Jubal, 'the father of all such as handle the harp and organ'? (But probably the higher criticism has long since wiped him out, poor chap!) Man was always a singing animal, but he played as soon and as often as he had instruments.

The debt of instrumental to vocal music was inevitable, but there were two sides to the transaction. Against much that is purely vocal in early keyboard works may be set even more vocal music by later composers (especially Bach and Beethoven) that was conceived instrumentally. And the main grievance against much present-day song-music by the so-called 'advanced' composers is that the singer is given music more apt for instruments. Mr. Colles says that the vocal element 'sinks deeper as the purely instrumental characteristics grow stronger.' It does—so much so that it has long ago been almost entirely submerged.

Nor can I agree that in the 'Forty-eight' 'the traces of vocal origin are as strong as in the works of Bach's primitive predecessors. The subjects themselves are all of vocal range, rarely more than the compass of an octave . . . the structure of each fugue is vocal . . .' The range of the subjects is surely due less to any vocal tradition than to the limitations of a pair of hands. A four-part (or even three-part) fugue in which the subject extended much beyond the octave would almost certainly tend to sprawl outside the player's reach. As for the structure of the fugues, it may be argued with reason that the vocal fugue owed its form to the instrumental. Surely the keyboard ricercari and canzone of the early Italians often went far nearer the genuine fugue than any choral efforts of the same period.

* Oxford University Press, 7s. 6d. † Ernest Benn.

Traces of vocal origin are seen in only a few of the 'Forty-eight,' i.e., the E flat in Book 2, the 'Saints in Glory' Fugue, &c. Oddly, Mr. Colles quotes the other E flat Fugue, and says that 'Bach's development of his theme is that of choral music.' But if ever there was a passage that owed its origin to the keyboard and to nothing else, it was the semiquaver figure which forms the codetta, and which is so extensively developed that it appears in thirty-one of the Fugue's thirty-eight bars. Here it is, used as an episode:

It is exactly right for the lie of the hand over a keyboard, and just as wrong for every other medium. There is no trace of vocal feeling in it. There is such a trace in the tune of the Chopin Nocturne Mr. Colles quotes. But (at the risk of appearing captious) I must part company with him concerning Chopin as a whole. It is true that to play through the Nocturnes is to realise that they are songs—'a glorification of the manners of Italian opera, particularly as exemplified in the style of Bellini.' But Chopin didn't confine himself to Nocturnes (thank goodness!). The greater Chopin is in the Studies, Scherzos, and Preludes, which owe very little to any vocal influence, least of all to Bellini. And even the Nocturnes contain many pages that are anything but song-like. Chopin was, in fact, a purely instrumental composer, and he showed this by his comparative failure when he tried his hand as a song-writer.

I think, then, that Mr. Colles works his opening proposition too hard. In fact (this being one of my argumentative and contrairy days) I feel disposed to take a view diametrically opposite, and contend that the art of music has suffered considerably from its vocal side. The words have been a snare and a stumbling-block to all concerned—the composer to whom a text, no matter how poor, is a very present help in trouble; the singer who finds his best market in the syrup of the 'lyric'-monger; and the general public, which loses what little critical sense it has when a song is being handed out. Observe what happens at any gathering other than a public concert—and to some extent even there. Instrumental music, no matter how good or well performed, is usually regarded as a background for chatter; but let some songster get to work, and no matter how bad the music or how faulty the singing the company is attentive. It would be a blessing if all vocal solos could be banned for a year, especially as there are so few able to sing with a degree of skill, taste, and musicianship comparable to that shown by the average good instrumentalist. We should then get down to real music: the pure milk of the word, sonatas, symphonies, and chamber works—just plain 'Ops.,' with no programmatic or textual jam to help the vitiated palates and feeble stomachs. For them there are cinemas, restaurant bands, and, on high days, grand opera. However, more about opera later.

Let us go back to the 'Forty-eight' for a moment, since that is ground chosen by Mr. Colles. He mentions the Fugues, but they are only one-half of the work—and in some respects the less inventive half. I said that few of the Fugues showed any marked vocal traces. When we turn to the Preludes we find such traces almost non-existent. In fact, they appear in only one out of the four dozen pieces—the E flat Prelude, in Book 1. Here bars 10-15 might be a piece of a cappella music, and the rest of the movement derives from the organ.

As for Bach's predecessors, I am inclined to think that many of the faults in their work are due to their anxiety to get away from the vocal style before they had any significant instrumental material to put in its place. They seemed to revel in their new-found freedom from the limitations of the voice, and their revels too often took the form of showy passages that bore us as much as they no doubt excited the players (who were generally the composers themselves). It happens that while I am writing this article there comes from Peters a new volume of Straube's 'Alte Meister des Orgelspiels,' wherein is abundant confirmation of this view. It contains some remarkably brilliant things by Brühns (1665-97), Bohm (1661-1733), Kerll (1627-93), and Froberger (1615?-67). (The showiness of Buxtehude is so familiar to most organist-readers that I pass him over.)

If it be objected that these men were so near Bach as to be contemporaries as well as predecessors (though most of their composing was finished by the time his was well under way), we may go farther back to that remarkable man Tunder, the discovery of whose excellence as a choral composer has recently caused some stir. As a keyboard writer (if we may judge from the few examples available) he was a tremendous chap, writing organ music with bold harmonies, difficult double pedal and widespread manual parts that have not the slightest suggestion of vocal origin. And there were also pre-Bach French composers doing much the same thing—in fact, the early French writers seem to have been ahead of the Germans in some ways.

I mention these examples, not for the sake of merely making a point, but because I have long felt that the traditional view of the early instrumental composers does them a lot less than justice. When I was in the pupil stage, one of the first things I was taught in regard to the evolution of style was that the 17th-century composers could think only in terms of vocal polyphony, and accordingly wrote keyboard pieces accommodatingly labelled 'apt for viols or voices.' No doubt much of their work was as suitable for voices as for instruments, but it doesn't seem to have occurred to historians that when a composer transplanted the choral idiom to instruments he may have done so from choice, and because he felt that what he wished to express called for that grave and sustained style which is at least as effective on strings or on the organ as when sung.

It was also a favourite means of obtaining contrast. Does the first part of Bach's 'St. Anne' Fugue sound less mature than the two sections that follow? Yet it is pure vocal music; transposed down, it would be so good a piece of choral writing that it might pass for an original. Nevertheless, it is equally perfect as organ music. And, mutatis mutandis, we might say the same of most of the slow sections in the string works of Byrd and Purcell.

Such things as the 'St. Anne' Fugue serve as reminders that Bach's keyboard writing was far less aggressively instrumental in style than that of his immediate predecessors; and the more mature his work, the greater its dependence on plain statement rather than on showy accessories. As for the Elizabethans, despite that 'apt for viols and voices' label, they wrote keyboard pieces that will tie up many a dashing pianist to-day.

So, in fine, I beg leave to differ (as contestants in the local Debating Society say) in toto and ab initio with Mr. Colles's premise that instrumental music is merely an extension of vocal, and that the vocal idiom was not outgrown as the instrumental forms matured.

In his final chapter Mr. Colles says very truly that 'Dramatic expression of words through song is an essential stage through which a nation's music must pass if it is to maintain its identity.' I am not so sure, however, that in order to make the most of song we must bring it into 'musical drama of some sort (which for convenience we call Opera).' Germany had a rich treasury of song before Wagner had written his best work. Had there never been a single German opera the nation would still have expressed itself in song through Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Wolf, with a completeness and subtlety to which opera can add nothing. Opera can do no more for song than load it with costume and properties, the usual result being to coarsen it and leave nothing to the imagination. Would Charles Wood's 'Ethiopia saluting the colours' be finer as an episode in an opera than it is as a song? Must we actually see 'the guidons marching by' and the ancient woman, 'blear-eyed, hardly human'; must we hear her broken accents, instead of having them merely suggested by a slight change of tone on the part of the singer? If so, Heaven help us! The future has nothing for us but the cinema, and art will soon be one long series of 'close-ups.'

Somebody wrote somewhere recently that operatic singing was the highest pinnacle in vocal art, and Mr. Colles too seems inclined to exaggerate its importance. Surely a fine Lieder-singer takes the top place. Those of us who sat at the feet of Plunket Greene in his palmy days, and heard him reel off thirty odd songs, taking us at will over the whole range of moods, and switching us from one period and country to another, with no aid beyond a pianoforte accompaniment, may well ask what operatic singer can do a like interpretative feat. And P. G. could do this, not with one programme but with many, all made up of words and music of a quality that few operas can maintain for so long a stretch. Your born song-singer is your true Pied Piper: he has us all at his heels, whereas his limelighted and bedizened brother of the opera gives us no more than an occasional thrill with yawns between.

But the conclusion of Mr. Colles's with which I fall out most is this: 'If we are not going to have English opera, in the end we are not going to have British music.'

What! Was there no British music before Purcell tried his hand at opera? And (to reverse the proposition) how much English opera was there during the Elizabethan period? I rub my eyes on seeing so sane a critic bring forward opera as the acid test, the sine qua non, and the crux (the local Debating Society has me in its toils again!). If the test holds, Italy has been the most musical of countries for generations, and is now in danger of decline because some of her younger composers are trying to get away from opera and to develop a symphonic school. Germany was far behind her in Beethoven's day (!). Franck and Berlioz did France a bad turn by giving her something more solid than the trivial operas which the misguided and no doubt prejudiced Bruneau declared had 'almost dealt a death-blow to music.'

If Mr. Colles's proposition holds good, Germany's musical greatness began with Weber and Wagner, for there was, strictly speaking, no German opera before. (Mozart's are, on the whole, Italian operas written by a German.) The English revival under Parry, Stanford, Elgar, Mackenzie, must have failed because it has given us no English opera that has taken its place in the repertory. But did the revival begin with these composers? Surely not. 'Maritana' and 'The Bohemian Girl' stepped straight into the repertory and stayed there, so the credit for the re-birth of English music must go to Wallace and Balfe. No! It won't wash. Let us have English opera by all means, and the sooner the better. As Mr. Colles says, it will provide an opening for the talented young musicians who are being turned out in hundreds from our training institutions. But whenever it comes, its incidence will have little bearing on the standard of English music in general. It may even lower that standard, for, as has been well said, in opera it is always the worst features that gain the most applause, and the works of the second- and third-rate composers almost monopolise the stage. Only in real music—especially chamber and symphonic works—do the lesser men find their level.

I am sure that Mr. Colles is under no illusions as to the relative unimportance of opera in the musical scheme; and I dwell on his astonishing dictum because it has been extensively quoted and made the most of by opera 'fans.' The 'fan' proudly points to a galaxy of great composers who have written opera. But how often do we see their names on the bill? A run of Beethoven, Gluck, Weber, Schubert, or even Mozart, would put up the shutters of any opera house, and its fortunes could be revived only by a course of Puccini, early Verdi (for we are rarely allowed to hear 'Falstaff' and 'Otello'), Massenet, Leoncavallo, Mascagni, one performance of the 'Ring,' and a few isolated ones of Wagner's other operas. (Recently-published statistics of opera performances in Germany show that Mozart, with 762 performances, came below Lortzing, who pipped him by five, with 767.) The great composers' operatic misses far outnumber their hits. Only Wagner kept on hitting, and his hits will survive when the musical-film has superseded the opera, because they have the merit of being strong just where most popular operas are weak—on the purely musical side. Long after the cinema has swallowed the opera house, our descendants will be listening to the cream of Wagner, either in the concert-room or as film accompaniments.

I admit that I have said some of this before, but the repetition has been necessary in order to support my argument. To the reader who hastily assumes that I am prejudiced against opera I reply that, on the contrary, I am a warm admirer of that form of entertainment. There are several operas that I have found quite enjoyable; and my dislike of the rest has been due to disappointment with some of the mere details, such as the music, or the story, or the English translation, or the whatnots.

(Mr. Fernandez-Arbos, conductor of the Madrid Orchestra, has just been telling an American music journalist something about the state of the art in the Spanish capital. Opera at Madrid is poor, he said; the public demand merely a star singer—a tenor for choice—with plenty of long-held high notes. The chief patrons of the opera are wealthy folk who will not attend symphony concerts, which depend for their existence on the professional and middle classes. What is the opera doing for Spanish music and music in Spain?)

As I said at the beginning of this article, my timid dissent from Mr. Colles's main thesis and conclusion does not detract from the value of the book. It is full of good matter, with, for core, a study of Purcell that is easily the best thing so far done in that way. So good is it that one wishes Mr. Colles would work it up into the exhaustive book on Purcell that has yet to be written. I had noted for quotation many happily expressed bits of wisdom, but space is running out, and I have still to say a few words about Prof. Buck's sixpennyworth. All I can do, therefore, is to add a hearty 'Hear! Hear!' to the chorus of approval that has greeted 'Voice and Verse.'

The price is only one of several astonishing things about Dr. Buck's 'History of Music.' Others are its novel plan, the skilful condensation, the freshness with which much that is necessarily familiar has been expressed, and (above all, perhaps) the breadth of outlook. As to the plan: 'in the belief that understanding should proceed from the known to the unknown,' Dr. Buck has written the history of music backwards in seven chapters—Music at the present time; The Romantic movement; The Viennese School; The Contrapuntal age; The Renaissance; The Vocal Millennium; and the Infancy of music. He prefaces these with a thoughtful chapter on the Meaning of History. The backwards method works out far more naturally than one would expect. It is, in fact, a refreshing change to start reading a history of music that doesn't open with an account of the Cypriote double-flute (circa 600 B.C.), the folk-music of the Jebusites, the Hittites, and the Amalekites, or that well-thumbed treatise the 'Sangītarātnakara' of Sārñgadeva (1210-1247).*

Dr. Buck's thumbnail method is nowhere better shown than in his glance at contemporary composers, e.g., 'the tongue-tied eloquence of Sibelius,' 'the appealing querulousness of Ravel,' 'the brilliant rhodomontade of Strauss'; Bartók 'is still apparently in doubt as to how he should express the things he undoubtedly has to say'; Bloch, 'after amazing the world by his ability to translate the whole spirit of Israel into music, goes deliberately into the wilderness in search of quarter-tones'; the music of Schönberg and his followers 'has had time to establish itself beyond the range of a few intellectual devotees, and it has, to all appearance, failed; and the gospel that attracts no congregation must ultimately die of inanition.' Bax is 'fresh and vigorous, full of intensely musical feeling,' but always creates 'a suspicion that he "went modern" a little against his better judgment.' Stravinsky has attracted his young coterie 'more by his astonishing virtuosity—one might almost say "slickness"—than by any great value in his content or depth in his emotion; and it looks as if his disciples are being forced, after their apprenticeship, to re-discover themselves.'

* Recent researches have convinced me that this generally accepted date is wrong. It should be 1210-48 N.S. But see Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 10,421,887B.

The sketch of Beethoven, too long to quote, and too compact to sample, is among the book's best pages; the essential conservatism of Wagner is well shown; the origin of equal temperament—a puzzle to many a musical man in the street—is so simply explained that the reader who fails to understand deserves to remain in darkness. And so I might go on, listing the excellences of this miniature history. Instead, I point out a couple of what I think are small slips: Carl Phillip Emanuel Bach is usually credited with the invention of sonata form, and Dr. Buck (p. 40) appears to agree. Historians always seem to overlook or underestimate John Sebastian's share in the sonata. His Organ Trio-Sonatas come very near to the real thing, with their definite second subjects, recapitulation, and key schemes. On p. 52 recitativo secco is said to be unaccompanied—a misleading way of showing that it was supported by an occasional chord, instead of by a definite accompaniment (stromento).

I add that this history fills only seventy-nine small pages, and it fills them to such purpose that there is not a redundant sentence. I started to give it a 'reviewer's skim'; I ended by reading every word; and it now takes its place on my shelves with its fatter fellow-histories of music—a minnow among the Tritons, but well in the swim.

NEW LIGHT ON LATE TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. Grattan Flood

XL.—Peter Philips

Recent research has shed much light on the career of Peter Philips, and has supplemented the admirable memoir by the late William Barclay Squire in Grove's 'Dictionary of Music and Musicians' (third edition, vol. 4). On this account it may be well to include him in the present series, adding a little, and correcting not a few of the biographical statements that have hitherto appeared.

Born in 156½, most probably in Devonshire, Peter Philips studied music in the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral, under Master Sebastian Westcote,* from 1572 to 1578. His name occurs as a choirboy of St. Paul's in the year 1574, as appears from the Visitation Book of Bishop Edwin Sandys (Bishop of London's Registry). We meet with an interesting reference to him in Westcote's will, dated April 3, 1582, namely, a bequest of £5 13*s.* 4*d.* to Peter Philips, 'remaining in my house'—a fact which suggests that Philips, after his voice broke, continued to lodge in his master's house until 1582. He fled to Antwerp in 1588.

Philips began to compose prior to the year 1580, as there is a Pavan by him, dated 1580,* in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book (i. 343), with the note 'the first one Philips made.' In this same Virginal Book is a Fantasia by him dated 1582 (i. 352). After the year 1590 there are ample evidences of the wonderful musical powers of the English exile. In 1591 was published at Antwerp his collection of madrigals, 'Melodia Olympica' (dated December 1, 1590), of which editions appeared in 1594 and 1611. This was followed by his 'Primo Libro de Madrigali,' for six voices, printed by Phalèse in 1596.

In 1597 Philips was appointed organist to the Archduke and Archduchess Albert and Isabella; and in 1598 his eight-part madrigals appeared, a work reprinted in 1599, and again in 1615. In this same year (1598) his old school-fellow, Thomas Morley, included two of Philips's English vocal pieces in his 'Madrigals to five voices,' and it is to be noted that Morley also inserted a Pavan and a Galliard by Philips in his 'Consort Lessons' (1599).

Mr. Henry Davey thus writes:

> 'Philips, who remained a Romanist, took Holy Orders and left England; he became Canon of Bethune, and afterwards lived at Rome, then was appointed one of the three organists to the Viceroy of the Netherlands; and in 1610 Canon of Soignies, where he still lived in 1633.'

This sentence contains several errors. Philips did not take Holy Orders before leaving England; he does not appear to have lived at Rome; his canonry at Bethune was only obtained in 1622; and he did not live at Soignies in 1633, as he died in 1628.

As to the date of Philips's ordination, I take it to be 1601,† and it seems most probable that he became a priest in order to qualify himself for a benefice; anyhow, it is certain that on March 9, 1610, he was appointed to a canonry in the Collegiate Church of St. Vincent, at Soignies—an old Irish foundation. Previous to his appointment he had published, in 1603, his 'Second Book of Madrigals' for six voices, at Antwerp (dedicated to his patrons the Archduke and Archduchess), of which a second edition appeared in 1615.

After the year 1610, Philips abandoned secular writing and devoted himself exclusively to sacred music, as became a Canon of Soignies. His first published collection of pieces, 'Cantiones Sacræ,' for five voices, appeared from Phalèse's press in 1612, and were dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. This volume was followed a year later by another bearing a similar title, for eight voices, dedicated to St. Peter. In 1613 was also published, by Phalèse, his 'Gemmulæ Sacræ Binis et Ternis Vocibus cum Basso Continuo ad Organum,' of which editions appeared in 1616 and 1621.

Quite a delightful little volume by Philips, entitled 'Les Rossignols Spirituels,' was issued

* See No. VIII. of the present series.

* Published in Morley's 'Consort Lessons' (1599), and in Senart's 'Den Lusthof' (1603).

by Jean Virulier, of Valenciennes, in 1616, being a collection of hymns or motets, including a 'Hodie Maria Virgo' (S.S.S.T.) signed by J. Palestrina. In this work Philips's name appears as 'Organist to their most Serene Highnesses the Archduke and Archduchess.' A second edition was issued in 1621, and a third (posthumously) in 1631. He also published, in 1616, another volume of sacred music, 'Deliciæ Sacræ Binis et Ternis Vocibus, cum Basso Continuo ad Organum,' dedicated to his viceregal patrons, a second edition of which appeared in 1622.

On January 5, 1621, as is recorded by Bergmans in his 'L'Organiste des Archiducs Albert et Isabelle, Peter Philips' (Gand, 1903), Philips exchanged his post as Canon of Soignies with Jerome van der Berghe for a perpetual chaplaincy in the Church of Saint Germain at Tirlemont (Brabant). Less than a year later he was appointed Canon of Bethune, a title which he is given in his collection of 'Litanies of Loreto' (set for from four to five voices, with basso continuo, published by Phalèse in 1623), and in the second edition of the eight-part 'Cantiones Sacræ,' which appeared in the year 1625.

Canon Philips lost his munificent patron, the Archduke Albert, on July 15, 1621, and at the funeral of this Prince, on March 12, 1622, he walked in the procession, heading the Court Chaplains. An interesting memento of the funeral procession was published by Jacques Francquart, at Brussels, in 1623, in which the portrait of Philips appeared.

Philips's last work was the first part of his 'Paradisus Sacris Cantionibus conditus, una, duabus, et tribus vocibus decantibus,' dated Brussels, April, 1628. He died soon after, as is recorded in an entry from the notebook of Dr. John Southcote, published by the Catholic Record Society: '1628. Peter Phillips, priest, died at Brussels' (vol. 1, p. 113). Dr. Fellowes gives the date of his death as 1625, but 1628 is correct. Other writers, including Barclay Squire, in 'Grove,' tell us that Philips was Canon of Soignies 'till his death in 1633,' but this statement is probably due to the fact that the second and third parts of his 'Paradisus' appeared in 1630 and 1633 respectively. As a fact, these two volumes were published posthumously.

Philips had a wonderful reputation on the Continent, but, as Mr. Squire writes, 'he was not forgotten in England,' as is evidenced from the following extract from Peacham's 'Compleat Gentleman' (London, 1627):

> 'Nor must I here forget our rare Countreyman, Peter Phillips, Organist to their Altezza's at Brussels, now one of the greatest Masters of Musicke in Europe. Hee hath sent us over many excellent Songs, as well Motets as Madrigels; he affecteth altogether the Italian veine.'

In recent years Philips has come into his own in England, and much of his sacred music was revived at Downside and at Westminster Cathedral by Sir Richard Terry. At the septcentenary celebrations in commemoration of St. Francis, at Assisi, in October, 1926, Philips's Motet in honour of the great founder of the Friars Minor, 'O Virum Mirabilem,' for five voices, was sung—as edited by Mr. H. B. Collins, from 'Cantiones Sacræ' (1612).

XLI.—Orlando Gibbons

Strictly speaking, Orlando Gibbons can scarcely be classed as a Late Tudor composer, but inasmuch as his upbringing at Cambridge was of that period, and as he was steeped in the traditions of the Elizabethan composers, he may fittingly close the present series. Moreover, Dr. Fellowes styles him 'one of the most important figures among the Tudor school of English musicians,' and a special folio volume is devoted to him in the Carnegie 'Tudor Church Music' series. Hence it may be well to summarise his biography.

To the average man Gibbons is known only by his Service in F, his 'Hosanna to the Son of David,' and his madrigal, 'The Silver Swan,' but these represent only a small fragment of the numerous compositions—more than a hundred and fifty—which perpetuate his fame.

Orlando Gibbons was the youngest child of William Gibbons, one of the Norwich 'waytes,' and was born at Oxford in December, 1583. He entered the choir of King's College, Cambridge, in February, 159$\frac{5}{6}$, and continued there until 1599, matriculating in the Easter term, 1598. After his voice broke he was (apparently) appointed assistant choirmaster, and between the years 1601 and 1603 was paid special fees for providing musical performances.

So great was Gibbons's reputation in 1603 that he was made organist of the Chapel Royal on March 21, 1604. He graduated Mus. B. at Cambridge in 1606, and was incorporated at Oxford ad eundem on July 14, 1607. Not only was he a brilliant organist; he was also an incomparable virginalist, and in 1611 he collaborated with Byrd and Bull in the virginal collection entitled 'Parthenia,' he being then a little over twenty-seven years of age. Out of the twenty-one pieces in this printed work, Gibbons contributed six, of which his 'Fantazia of Foure Parts' is a really great work.' *

Between the years 1611 and 1618 he received many marks of Court favour, and in September, 1619, was appointed Court Virginalist, at a salary of £46 a year; he was also one of H.M. Musicians, at a further salary of £40. In 1612 appeared his only volume of madrigals, entitled 'First Set of Madrigals or Motetts of 5 Parts,' containing twenty numbers, including such gems as 'The Silver Swan,' 'Now each flow'ry bank of May,' 'What is our life?' 'Dainty, fine bird,' 'Ah, dear heart,' and 'Nay, let me weep.'

Gibbons's 'Cryes of London' is remarkable for having parts for viola and a superimposed vocal score for S.A.T.B., and is in reality an 'In Nomine' for strings, one of the viols playing the plainsong melody 'Gloria Tibi Trinitas.' This Fancy was probably composed circa 1614, and it is certain that one of the MSS. containing it was written by Thomas Myriell in 1616.

On the occasion of the founding of the Chair of History at Oxford, by Camden, on May 17, 1622, Gibbons was, at Camden's request, given the degree of D. Mus., another recipient of the degree being

* Orlando's brother Ferdinando was one of the Waits of Lincoln. Dr. Fellowes writes: 'Of Ferdinando nothing is known beyond the fact that he is mentioned in the wills of his mother and his brother Ellis.' But in the Corporation Records of Lincoln, under the date of June 8, 1611, a livery was ordered to Ferdinando Gibbons, one of the City's musicians.

William Heather (founder of the Chair of Music at Oxford). A year later, in 1623, Gibbons was given the post of organist of Westminster Abbey, where he took part in the funeral service of James I.

Early in June, 1625, Gibbons was summoned to bring the Chapel Royal choristers to Canterbury to greet the new Queen, who had been married by proxy to King Charles I., at Paris, on May 11. On the feast of Pentecost, June 5, he was seized with a fit of apoplexy, and died, being buried on the following day in Canterbury Cathedral, where a tablet was erected to his memory, with his bust and coat of arms. He died intestate, but his widow, Elizabeth, obtained letters of administration on July 13, 1626.

Thanks to the efforts of the late Sir Frederick Bridge, a Gibbons Commemoration was given at Westminster Abbey on June 5, 1907, attended by the Worshipful Company of Musicians, and a replica of the Canterbury bust was presented to the Abbey by the late C. T. D. Crews, who also defrayed the expense of the Commemoration. The many celebrations of 1925 are of too recent date to dwell on. Gibbons's chief monument, however, is his Church music, which is now available to all.

THE PRAYER BOOK VERSION OF THE PSALMS, AND ITS MUSICAL RENDERING

By G. C. Richards

(Canon of Durham, and Professor of Greek and Classical Literature in the University of Durham.)

In 1535, Miles Coverdale translated the Psalms. When the Great Bible of 1539-41 (often called Cranmer's Bible because of Cranmer's Preface to six of its seven editions) came out, a large part of the work had been done by Coverdale, and we may attribute the Psalter to him with some confidence. He had, in composing his version, made considerable use of the Latin translation of the Old Testament by Sebastian Münster, Court preacher at Heidelberg. He was, of course, like every divine of the day, familiar with Latin, and could speak it and write it as a means of communication with foreign scholars. It is therefore primâ facie likely that this would affect his version, and so it does, though not in the way we should expect (i.e., in the vocabulary) but in another direction.

Within the last twenty years considerable progress has been made in the analysis of ancient prose rhythm. Prof. Thaddeus Zielinski's study of Cicero's speeches first drew attention to the subject in this country, and Prof. A. C. Clark, of Oxford, has found his results of the greatest use in establishing the text of Cicero's speeches. Almost every year scholars are applying the results of these researches to fresh Latin authors. The Roman orators borrowed from Greece a rhythmical termination to the rhetorical sentence ('Clausula'), which had certain definite variations. The most common were :

1. — ∪ — | — ∪ : cretic and trochee.
   morte ui | ˋcistis. : with its metrical equivalent.
   — ∪ ∪ — | — ∪
   esse uide | atur. ; an ending the frequency of which in Cicero drew ridicule upon him.
2. — ∪ — | — ∪ — : double cretic.
   cessit au | daciae.
3. — ∪ — | — ∪ — ∪
   gaudium peruenir. : cretic followed by two trochees.

If occasionally three long syllables ('Molossus') or long two shorts long ('Choriambus') are allowed as substitutes for a cretic, and, of course, allowing the final syllable to be long or short, we account for 84.7 per cent. of the 17,902 'clausulæ' in Cicero's speeches.

The pleasure given to the ear ('Cicero Orator,' 198, uoluptas aurium) caused this rhythmical arrangement to affect all prose writers, historians, and Christian writers as well as orators. St. Cyprian uses the three simple forms as given above almost monotonously. Presently, however, the sense of quantity began to disappear, and yet the rhythmical system persisted and triumphantly adapted itself to the stress accent alone. Thus ultimately we find :

1. génus hum | anum;
2. bóna re | média ;
3. gaúdia | pérue | níre ; *

which are quite wrong from the point of view of quantity :

(a.) ∪ ∪ — |— — (b.) ∪ ∪ ∪ |∪ ∪ ∪

but quite right from the accentual point of view.

Finally, the rules of the 'cursus,' as it came to be called, were drawn up for the guidance of the Papal Chancery in the 12th century, and dominated European Latin down to the Renaissance, when scholars deliberately departed from it. But it had rooted itself too deeply in the Church to be discarded, and it was only natural that it should affect any translation from the Latin into the vernacular.

I have recently been investigating its effect on the Prayer Book. I thought at first that I was the pioneer in this field, but Mr. John Shelly, in a short article in the Church Quarterly Review for 1912, can claim that honour. What he states there is absolutely correct. He found that in sixty per cent. of the Collects the 'cursus' was obeyed. The Collect for the Annunciation has all three forms in the Latin, and those forms slightly modified in the English. I started with the Litany, in which I found that of the thirty-one petitions with which it begins, every one conforms to the 'cursus' with one slight variation, which can be briefly explained.

The mediæval names given to the three usual varieties are (1) Planus, (2) Tardus, (3) Velox. It is greatly to be desired that we should continue to use this nomenclature. Some names must be devised, and though we may justly think that 2 and 3 might have been better inverted, there is a great advantage in adhering to the old system.

An analysis of the thirty-one petitions shows that eight are ordinary 'cursus planus,' e.g., 'mércy upón us'; eight are Cicero's variation, which (now that the sense of quantity has gone) means the insertion of an extra syllable,

* I have deliberately taken the illustrations given by Prof. Clark. It would be easy to illustrate by examples the gradual disappearance of the quantitative rhythm until it was entirely replaced by accentual rhythm.

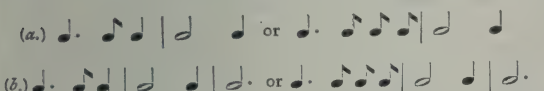
e.g., ' míserable sínners.' In some cases ' planus ' is, on the other hand, docked of a final syllable. This is to be expected in the English language, which is so full of strong monosyllables, some of which, e.g., ' all,' seem to occupy more time in pronunciation than others, almost ' aw-awl.' So in the Litany we find ' únder our | féét.' This makes seventeen cases of ' planus ' ; there are nine of ' tardus,' either ordinary (' shów it ac- | -córdingly '), or with an extra syllable (' cóming of the | Hóly Ghóst'), and five of ' velox,' e.g., ' ángry with | ús for | éver.'

I was then prepared for something similar in the Psalms ; and I find that in seventy-five per cent. of the verses the ' cursus ' is observed in both halves, very seldom in the same form in both, though occasionally, perhaps to express identity of meaning, e.g., ' brúise them with a | ród of | íron : . . . píeces like a | pótter's | véssel.'

It is now patent that the Anglican chant, with its three and four bars, arose quite naturally and normally, and modern attacks upon it are only ridiculous. ' Velox ' suggested the four bars, ' planus ' suggested the three, and ' tardus ' is applicable to either half, as plainly we may emphasise its last syllable and separate it from the others. It is, however, equally clear that if we are to have a system of pointing in which every syllable is properly pronounced (and let me remark that a monosyllable may have a stress accent by itself and lose it in a sentence), and no unimportant word has a strong accent (and this is the object of the most recent Psalters), it must be realised that this is unattainable if we persist in two-time chants. Anyone can see this if he tabulates the permissible variations (Psalm 1) :

1. ' Planus '—' gódly shall | pérish ' ; but often : ' doéth it shall | prosper.'
2. ' Tardus '—' císe himself | dáy and níght ' ; but often : ' plánted by the | wáterside.'
3. ' Velox '—' stóod in the | wáy of | sínners ' ; but often (Psalm 2) : ' fúriously | rage to | géther.'

On the other hand, triple time can meet every requirement :



But the application of this new knowledge I, who am no musician, must leave to the musicians. I have written, because I want them to understand, in the first instance, how Coverdale would have recited his own version. He would have been entirely guided in that—instinctively, of course, not consciously—by his constant use of the Latin language. A small committee could meet and point the Psalms with complete agreement in a very few hours if they all accepted these conclusions ; they might be in disagreement as to perhaps five per cent. of the total number of verses. When this was done, it would be the task of musicians to write us chants which in singing should do no violence to the natural spoken rendering. At present Psalters are constantly being produced which do not take into account the essential facts.

BRITISH FOLK-SONG ABROAD

By Frank Howes

Five singers, a bagpiper, and an odd-job man one day early in this year set sail from Harwich to persuade the Continent of Europe that the folk-music of Britain is varied, characteristic, and lovely. Too big an undertaking, of course, to be accomplished in the three concerts that we gave, but since one of them was broadcast from Cologne and was heard, to my knowledge, in Czecho-Slovakia, we covered some of the ground. At The Hague, and at Cologne, we were able to employ a more intimate kind of persuasion.

Last summer an invitation came from the Cologne branch of the International Contemporary Music Society to the British Music Society to provide a programme of British folk-music for a series of concerts in which every country in Europe sent representatives to perform its characteristic national folk-music. The B.M.S. called upon the Folk-Song Society to co-operate, with the result that I was given certain advice and asked to undertake the expedition. I found sufficient courage to face Continental criticism from former experience at summer-schools at Oxford of presenting British folk-song to audiences of foreigners, who not only make its acquaintance with pleasure but will sing it communally with the greatest alacrity.

I knew from this that if folk-music can be convincingly presented, there is no doubt of its reception. I therefore proceeded to devise a programme on lines that would be as representative as possible—representative, that is, of local character ; of the different kinds of folk-song (long narrative ballads, love songs, sea songs, work songs, singing games, religious songs, street cries, &c.) ; of the different collectors and arrangers (Lucy Broadwood, now the president of the English Folk-Song Society, Cecil Sharp, Vaughan Williams, Sir Richard Terry, W. G. Whittaker, Mrs. Kennedy Fraser, Holst, Sweeting, Fuller-Maitland, and Herbert Hughes) ; of the different ways of singing them (unaccompanied, with pianoforte accompaniment, and in vocal ensemble).

The Celtic songs presented a difficulty which I never completely overcame. It was the view of the Folk-Song Society that Welsh songs and the Gaelic songs of Scotland and Ireland should be sung only by singers with the corresponding quality of blood in their veins. This injunction I could not carry out in its complete purity, but I found a contralto singer in my friend Miss Denne Parker who was quite Caledonian enough to give the full flavour of the Hebridean songs, which it seemed to me must at any cost be represented. If I could have found a Welsh tenor able to sing folk-songs with the requisite simplicity of style, that would have brought in Wales. But I failed to do this, and Ireland got in only by the skin of its teeth because Miss Adelaide Rind, who has the largest repertory of folk-song of any singer I know, suggested the little Dublin fragment arranged by Hughes, ' I will walk with my love.' This proved to be one of the songs which made the most marked impression. The Isle of Man had to be passed over for lack of space. In fact, my failure to give fair representation to the various racial and local flavours found in these islands was my salvation, for I found as it was that my programme was already too long, and only a very firm letter from our German hosts about the duration of the concerts kept my enthusiasm within practical bounds.

In the event, i.e., after my singers had made their suggestions, the programme assumed this form. We began with the long ballad 'The twa' sisters o' Binnorie,' sung in Whittaker's Northumbrian version. Our tenor, Mr. Hugh Haworth, was the narrator, while the other singers assumed a character apiece whenever the drama employed direct speech. No accompaniment was employed until the harp was mentioned. Mr. Ernest Potts's deep bass voice as the ghost, and the last refrain in unison, made an impressive finish. Other but shorter ballads followed, including one ensemble number, Dr. Sweeting's arrangement of 'The trees they do grow high.' Then came a group of love songs. Each singer had a solo song, and we completed the group with Holst's 'I love my love.' This was undoubtedly our best effort in ensemble singing; we were an ad hoc party, and diligent rehearsal was not enough to enable us to give to Vaughan Williams's 'The dark-eyed sailor' the finish and precision we should have liked. Both the critic of the Kölnische Zeitung and of the Nieuwe Rotterdamsche Courant singled out the Holst part-song as one of the most notable things in our programme.

The next section contained sea-songs. I had been implored not to use a pianoforte accompaniment with shanties, but I so far hardened my heart as to accompany 'Shenandoah,' leaving 'Johnny, come down to Hilo,' to be sung unaccompanied by Mr. Haworth, with the rest joining in the refrains. 'In Hebrid Seas,' also unaccompanied, 'in which the very life of the sea resounds' (Kölnische Zeitung), was 'magnificently sung' (De Telegraf, Amsterdam) by Miss Parker. We finished with Holst's 'Swansea Town.'

The next group was miscellaneous. It comprised children's songs, of which 'Tripping up the green grass,' sung by Miss Marie Howes, appealed to the Dutch critics, who made the general criticism that there was a certain sameness of melodic quality in the English songs, even in lighter and humorous songs such as this. Mr. Ernest Potts contributed his inimitable Northumbrian dialect song 'Elsie Marley,' which made an immediate appeal. An arrangement by Roberton of the Hebridean 'Smooring Prayer,' for female trio, commended itself to audiences and critics alike. As a final group we sang some Christmas songs. At the concert at The Hague, where our hosts were the Nederland-Engeland Society, who welcomed the use of the English language, I was able to persuade the audience to take up the refrains to some of these final songs, which gave an extra touch of cheerfulness to an otherwise serious and perfectly decorous concert.

One very important feature of our programme I have not yet mentioned—the playing of the Northumbrian small-pipes by Mr. Tom Clough, who was specified by name in the original invitation. Mr. Clough still practises the traditional art of playing original variations on folk-tunes. The possibilities of florid melody based on such a tune as 'Oh dear, what can the matter be?' are considerable, for, unlike the Scottish bagpipe, the small pipe has a complete scale, and, as befits a domestic instrument, is sweeter in tone. A second group consisted of dance tunes—reel, jig, and hornpipe.

It is impossible to be both critic and performer. What I was most anxious to do was to observe the impression which the different songs made upon the audience. But as I sat with my back to the audience, facing my singers who sat round a table to my right hand, my impressions were not very reliable. The critics, however, made one or two points. The Cologne critic, Herr W. Jacobs, wrote a careful, penetrating, and on the whole appreciative notice in which he noted the antiquity and the modal character of the songs. 'In spite of a certain amount of monotony due to the recurrence of the melody in the strophic songs, one was repeatedly astonished to discover how full of charm these songs are, with their flavour of the soil, of times gone by, often with peculiar cadences, showing the rich, emotional life of the various races in all its diversity.' One opinion expressed astonishment at the variety and 'temperamental' character of the songs. The Amsterdam Telegraf, however, complained of monotony and lack of character. 'Folk-songs may be simple, but do not need to be insipid and flat, even if they are of the most elementary stage of melody and harmony. From this point of view I was much disappointed, in the sea songs especially.' Songs that caused favourable comment were: 'The Nightingale' (Appalachian Mountains, U.S.A.), 'The Bold Young Farmer' (East Anglia), 'The Evening Prayer' (Devon), 'Lord Rendal,' and 'My Johnny was a shoemaker.' The shanties were known to the Dutch audience from previous hearings by wireless. The ensemble numbers, which are certainly among the most delightful by-products of the folk-song revival, were appreciated, and naturally aroused the greatest purely musical interest. The point of the words, especially humorous words, was always quickly taken up.

Of the effect of our wireless concert we naturally could tell nothing. It might have been anything in the world, considering the conditions. We did not know till the day before how much would be required of us. In the event we broadcast the greater part of our main programme for eighty-five minutes, and did not use the items we had in reserve (which was fortunate, since they were less adequately rehearsed). We had got up at 5.30 and caught a train which tumbled us out on Cologne platform at 12.10, and at 1 o'clock we were broadcasting, making such modifications as were necessary as we went along, with many muttered questions and explanations in unready English and still more unready German. We were, however, very glad indeed of the opportunity of being heard by a wider audience all over Europe. Reception, we heard afterwards, was good in the Rhineland, and Mr. Clough's friends reported that we were heard in Northumberland, but listeners further south in England were shut off by Morse code in the Channel.

There is a social side to an expedition of this sort hardly less valuable than the musical. Europe is bursting with international goodwill, and people go out of their way to be kind. As usual, this fraternal spirit found expression in nocturnal feasts of sausages, scrambled eggs, and lager beer. Internal concord made the odd-job man's task easy, and he takes this opportunity of acknowledging with gratitude the willing hard work and the attendant cheerfulness of his company. The Kölnische Zeitung extended the hospitality of its columns to him, and printed an article on the previous Sunday giving a short account of English folk-song and its revival, and the promoters of the concert had secured the services of two translators who made admirable versions of the English words, with which, through the kindness of the B.M.S., both audiences were provided. Everything was therefore made easy for us, and I think I can say with all proper humility and pride that some measure of success attended our efforts to preach the gospel of British folk-song. At any rate it was a thoroughly enjoyable expedition.

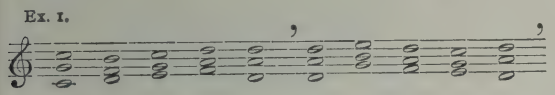
THE MYSTERY OF FAUX-BOURDON SOLVED

By Charles van den Borren

The theory that faux-bourdon originated in England has long been held, but no precise documentary evidence has been brought to confirm it, so that even such an eminent judge as Mr. H. E. Wooldridge was able to put forth, with some reason, the supposition of a French origin*; and Mr. F. Ludwig, treating the question summarily in Guido Adler's 'Handbuch der Musikgeschichte' (1924, p. 247), stated, only four years ago, that the English origin of faux-bourdon had not yet been proved.

In its strictest form faux-bourdon consists of a succession of chords of thirds and sixths, enframed by chords in the root position, with the third omitted:

Ex. 1.



There is mention of it, for the first time and in a rather vague and incomplete way, in the treatises of Chilston and of Lionel Power, which in all likelihood date from the beginning of the 15th century. More than half a century later (towards 1470), Guilelmus Monachus, in his 'De preceptis artis musice et practice compendiosus libellus,' describes it with precision, and assigns an English origin to it.†

But these descriptions belong in fact to a period in which faux-bourdon was accepted and practised in Continental Europe, so that the English origin of this manner of singing could not be proved with certitude, unless the English polyphonic repertory offered examples of it at a time when it had not yet been adopted on the Continent.

The absence of documents of this kind could, to a certain extent, be explained by the fact that faux-bourdon was admirably adapted to improvised execution, which, of course, excluded the necessity of written notation.‡

The recent researches made by Dom Anselm Hughes have thrown unexpected light on questions previously doubtful and obscure. On December 2, 1924, he laid the corner-stone of his discoveries in a communication presented to the Musical Association under the title of 'Worcester Harmony of the 14th century.'* In exploring the manuscripts of Worcesterian provenance dating from before the 15th century, he met with different pieces in which the presence of faux-bourdon cannot be denied.

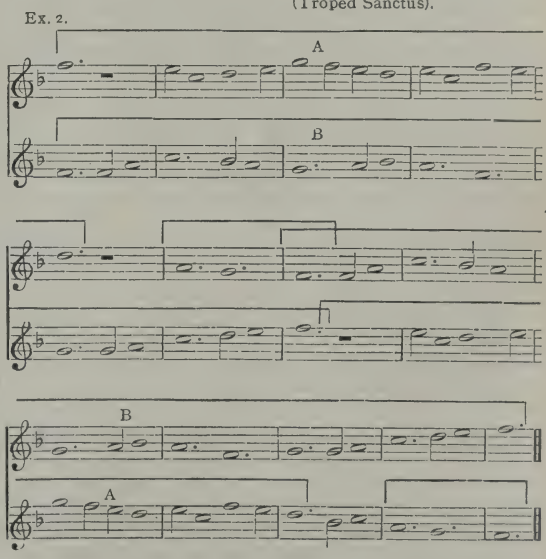
Since then he has further pursued his work, and has brought out, through the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society, a collection of pieces extracted from the Worcester manuscripts,† wherein faux-bourdon manifests itself in the most brilliant manner.‡

The date of these pieces can be deduced from certain unmistakable peculiarities of style and notation. Nearly all belong to the latter half of the 13th, and to the beginning of the 14th centuries—in other words, to a period in which the faux-bourdonesque manner of writing was totally unknown on the Continent.

This does not mean, however, that no relation exists between the style of the Worcester compositions and that practised in France in the 13th century. On the contrary, it is quite certain that the English musicians of that time were strongly influenced by the great school of Notre Dame of Paris, and that they adopted not only the forms which had been created or developed by that school—Organum, Conductus, Motet—but, moreover, certain very characteristic manners of composing, among others that which consists in practising what the Germans call Stimmtausch, of which the following is an example:

No. 6 of 'Worcester Mediæval Harmony' (Troped Sanctus).

Ex. 2.



As one readily sees, this is neither canon nor free imitation (with stretto), but a complex form of repetition which results in what we call to-day double-counterpoint.

When a piece is entirely conceived acccording to the system of Stimmtausch, it belongs to the rondellus type, which (it is important to note) has nothing to do with the French musico-literary rondeau, or rondel, of the 13th-15th centuries.

* 'Oxford History of Music,' ii., pp. 97 et seq.

† He calls it modus faulxbordon, and speaks of it in his chapter 'De Modis Anglicorum.'

‡ If the notation imposed itself on the Continent in the 15th century, it is because at that period certain figured forms of faux-bourdon, no longer belonging to the domain of improvisation, were in current practice.

The compositions published by Dom Anselm Hughes include two of these rondelli (No. 98, 'De supernis sedibus'; No. 99, 'Fulget cœlestis curia'). The second is interesting in that, despite its peculiar workmanship, it is instinct with the spirit of faux-bourdon, which would never have been the case with a French piece of the 13th century based on the principle of Stimmtausch.

The fact is that, on its advent into England, the French ars antiqua came under local influences which modified it, and in more than one case transfigured it. First of all, the English melodic vein, so fresh, so spontaneous, often reveals itself with exquisite charm in these Worcesterian religious compositions. And the fact that the consonances of thirds or sixths are very frequently used in contrast with fifths and independently of faux-bourdon, accounts for the harmonic smoothness and fullness so often present in these compositions—a characteristic absent from French works of the same period. Moreover, this frequent use of thirds produces triads (root, third, and fifth) in England, when in France bare fifths would invariably have been used.

Besides demonstrating the English origin of faux-bourdon, Dom Anselm Hughes's publication establishes still another remarkable fact, namely, that the famous 'Sumer is icumen in' (circa 1240) no longer appears as an isolated and quasi-miraculous phenomenon in the history of English music. It is true that no piece of the Worcester manuscripts exhibits the form of a four-part canon with a double pes which distinguishes that astonishing composition. But several among them incontestably have an atmosphere which in a singular way recalls the Rota of Reading. Such is the case, for example, with the three-part 'Alleluya Canite,' No. 22, of which Dom Anselm Hughes so justly says that it 'breathes a simple idea of pure, fresh-air things.' How far a piece like this is from the French Ars antiqua!—productions of a technique at once more harsh and more rational. Beneath the ingenuous lulling of such tender harmonies, one already feels the spirit of William Byrd, so mildly radiant. We shall find these specifically British characteristics in the 'Alleluya, Iustus germinabit,' No. 25,* in the 'Alleluya, Psallat hæc familia,' No. 29 (of which the joyous carillon recalls in an especially typical way 'Sumer'), in the Motet, 'Te Domine laudet, Te Domine clamat,' No. 72, and in the two rondelli, 'De supernis sedibus,' No. 98, and 'Fulget cœlestis curia,' No. 99. The fact cannot be too much insisted upon: however poor the residue of English polyphonic music of the 13th and 14th centuries may be, a break of the greatest importance has been filled by the bringing to light of these Worcester fragments.

A BERLIOZ CONFERENCE

By Tom S. Wotton

Once upon a time a number of eminent musicians held a post-prandial conference to decide on the merits of Hector Berlioz. Whether dinner be more conducive to the weighing of the pros and cons of a case than afternoon tea, or breakfast, is a nice point that need not here detain us. More important was the menu. Let us hope that it was typically French, both as regards food and drink, for—to take an extreme example—it is difficult to imagine a brain responding freely to French ideas with a certain organ beneath it replete with sauerkraut, liver-sausage, and Pilsener beer.

The discussion appears to have centred round the question as to whether Berlioz were a charlatan—a term probably used for purely argumentative purposes, since no mere trickster could have survived persistent abuse for a century. It is true that there has, during the same time, been a chorus of praise from such men as Schumann, Liszt, Hans von Bülow, Cornelius, Mottl, Pasdeloup, Colonne, and Adolphe Jullien and Alfred Ernst, the last named two of the earliest and most energetic disciples of Wagner in France. All these make a braver show than the other side, which included Zelter, Fétis (who rated Beethoven soundly for the use of an unprepared ninth), Scudo, and unmusical Paris of the 1850's. This, however, is only a suggestion. The Parisians of the mid-century may have been as right in their estimate of Berlioz as, a few decades before, the Viennese were in respect to Beethoven and Schubert.

Somebody once remarked that the proper test for a piece of music was whether it sounded well on the pianoforte. This saying, like many another based on wrong premisses, has been repeated till it has been taken by some musicians as a truth. But, one asks, why the pianoforte—a percussion instrument incapable of prolonging its sounds? It was chosen, probably, because in the dark days before gramophones and wireless it was included amongst the furniture of every household claiming to be musical, and therefore the 'test' was on tap, as it were. If a discussion arose as to the beauty of (say) Palestrina's Improperia, there was an infallible arbiter ready to pronounce judgment.

It is possible to appreciate to some extent the idea that inspired the saying, since we all know of compositions clothed in glittering orchestration that on first hearing appeared to be the genuine article. The keyboard abolished the glitter, and hence we were able to view the music more dispassionately. But is it quite fair to test the quality of even a simple melody conceived for one instrument by playing it on another of a totally different timbre? Do we arrive better at the true musical significance of the first three notes of the 'Oberon' Overture by transferring them to the tempered scale of the pianoforte? And there is a still more serious objection to the 'test.' Why, when discarding the mantle of orchestral colouring, should that of harmonic colouring be retained? Do we not know of pieces which, shorn of their harmony, would be woefully trite? Brahms is said to have judged a song by covering all except the melody and bass. This plan is far more consistent, even though the bass may suggest to the expert eye harmonies undreamt of by the composer. Whether Brahms used this method when criticising his own symphonies or Wagner's operas we are not told.

Perhaps the above may seem much like beating at an open door, since of late years the futility of judging of many of the ultra-modern scores through a pianoforte arrangement must be apparent to the most unthinking. Nevertheless, the fact that Berlioz's music does not lend itself to keyboard treatment is sufficient proof to many quite respectable people that it cannot be first-rate. It never seems to strike them that the reason why so much music does sound well on the pianoforte is because the composers so often thought in pianoforte idiom, even though they may have worked away from the instrument. And, as regards the latter, it is to be feared that many do not follow the correct rules of the game. They impress upon their pupils the evils that attend composing at the keyboard, and adduce the awful example of Meyerbeer—who is said to have struck chords with one hand, writing them down with the other*—and then retire secretly to their chamber to try over those modulations that lead into the second subject of their overture, even going back to the very commencement of the work the better to judge of the effect. If they change nothing after tinkling their ideas on the pianoforte, the process is sheer waste of time; if they do modify them, their talk of composing away from the instrument is mere splitting of hairs. The anonymous somebody whose dictum I have cited probably had not sufficient confidence in himself to launch a piece on the world without this 'try-over,'† and thus persuaded himself that it was an adequate test for the music of other composers. Some, when in doubt, fly to the organ, and in their scores we can at times recognise the manual and the registration they employed for their test.

Berlioz never had recourse to the pianoforte, either at the moment of inspiration or on the morning after, for the simple reason that he could not play the instrument. He, like Haydn, would, however, submit particular passages to different instrumentalists to learn whether they presented any technical difficulties. This habit helped to make him supreme in the art of orchestration, removed him still further from pianistic platitudes, and hence militated against his popularity. Wagner was right when he declared that his own music would be eventually appreciated through the music-desks of the domestic pianoforte. Anyone who remembers the early days of the cult will agree with the prophecy. The pianofortes of musical Europe resounded with interpretations of the vocal scores. They may have consisted principally of enthusiasm and an abuse of the pedal, but they undoubtedly helped enormously in diffusing the light. This road to popularity has been closed to Berlioz. Even the full score of an unknown work of his, as Saint-Saëns has insisted, does not give much idea as to how it will sound. He has thus been dependent on rare performances under sympathetic conductors—a point to be considered later—not only for appreciation, but for that familiarity that breeds acceptance.

When meeting for the first time someone who eventually becomes our friend, often we are repelled by certain asperities of character, certain tricks of manner. As our friendship grows, we become accustomed to these and accept them. In music it is a commonplace that the ear is soon habituated to discords that at first distressed it. And so it is with all the elements that contribute to the making of a musical composition. Could we but re-value some of the masterpieces it would be a revelation to most of us how much we accept as good, solely on account of familiarity. Save for a few works, Berlioz has not reaped the benefit of that familiarity. He suffers a revaluation on each performance. Now, this may be desirable occasionally, as witness Alfred Noyes's masterly revaluation of Bunyan,* an author who most assuredly is accepted, and was placed by such a man as Macaulay on a level with Shakespeare and Goethe. But continual repetition of the process is inadvisable. It resembles too closely the impatient plan practised by some of us in our early efforts at gardening, when we pulled up our plants to see how they were progressing.

To anyone who would declare that, as he had already valued the acknowledged masterpieces, even an occasional revaluation is unnecessary, I would put the question—When did this critical examination take place? In all probability he was persuaded of the excellence of particular compositions long before his personal opinion was of the slightest weight. The musical girl or boy may admire certain passages or movements. But the greater portion of what they hear they unconsciously take on trust. They accept it, as they accept other opinions of those about them, without attempting to argue the subject. Indeed, in many cases their minds are too immature to be able to do so. Eventually these opinions become, to use the language of the psychiatrists, 'fixations': we all have them, and then nothing will move us. As a matter of fact, most of us never, strictly speaking, value accepted works in the first instance, and seldom, if ever, revalue them. It is true that we sometimes make attempts at the latter. But it usually resolves itself into a plausible justification of our 'fixations.' We set out to prove that the melody that we love is constructed according to all the rules that govern melody, that the movement that thrills us does so because it possesses such and such attributes.

I am not here discussing whether Berlioz were a genius or a charlatan. I am merely endeavouring to show that he has suffered from disadvantages unshared by others of his generation. His entire dependence on public performances prevents his becoming the household word that many composers, immeasurably his inferiors, have become. And those performances must be directed by a sympathetic and skilful conductor. This reasonable proviso may, however, be disputed by some, who will insist that their particular pet masterpieces remain so, even though the execution be hopelessly indifferent. As they know these by heart, and thus can make allowances for the deficiencies of performance, the argument is hardly conclusive. Composers themselves cannot always extort their own meaning from an orchestra when they have the baton in hand. Schumann notoriously could not, and recently we have had an example of Mr. Goossens obtaining a swing and a glow from Ravel's 'La Valse' unattainable by the composer. The most sympathetic conductor cannot however make bricks without straw. All he can do is to reveal what is already in the score. Weingartner, in his booklet on 'Conducting,' is very emphatic on this point.

Another thing which possibly has affected Berlioz's popularity is his aristocracy. By birth he was what we might call 'county-family,' with its austerities softened through possessing a free-thinking father. Like Horace, he hated the profanum vulgus. Gounod, as reported by Saint-Saëns,* evidently referred to this aristocracy when he said, 'Quel homme élégant que Berlioz!' The younger musician, commenting on this, points out that while the writing of Berlioz was 'gauche et maladroite,' and that of Gounod 'impeccable,' the music of the latter contained elements of vulgarity never present in that of the former, and that these traces of vulgarity helped to make 'Faust' more popular than 'The Damnation of Faust.' It would be possible to make a parallel comparison on this count between Berlioz and other composers greater than Gounod, were it not inadvisable to attempt to exalt one artist by belittling another. True disciples of the French master will appreciate this trait in his music. His brigands may be rascals, but they are not apaches. They would relieve you of your valuables with a courtly bow, and cut your throat with a well-turned compliment on the blueness of your blood. His very devils seem to promise Faust a cultured eternity, if an unpleasantly warm one.† It was this same aristocracy that forbade him seeking to illustrate the grosser side of passion in his love-music.

* Much of the 'Flying Dutchman,' by the way, was hammered out at the pianoforte. For 'The Mastersingers,' on the other hand, we have Richter's word that Wagner never touched the instrument.

These are some of the things that have affected Berlioz's popularity, and to a large extent always will affect it. It is a matter for regret that there are so few gramophone records of his works obtainable.

The conference, by the way, appears to have decided nothing. Perhaps, after all, there was something wrong with the menu.

NON-MUSICAL FACTORS IN THE APPRECIATION OF MUSIC

By P. E. Vernon,

(Strathcona Research Student in Psychology and John Stewart of Rannoch Scholar in Sacred Music at Cambridge University)

(Concluded from March number, p. 228)

So far we have been considering some of the apparently non-musical responses or effects produced by music. We may now pass on to non-musical influences or stimuli that affect music.

The first of these are visual sensations; a few people listen with their eyes closed, but the great majority receive and react to a very large number of visual impressions while they are supposed to be listening. But this does not mean that all this side of their mental activity is wasted from a musical point of view. The amateur musician may attain to a fuller perception and appreciation of music by following the score, thus aiding hearing with vision; or by watching performers he may keep his attention more closely on the music and may follow the inner parts by seeing the appropriate instruments playing. Again, there is the important factor of intuition, a kind of subconscious perception by one member of a group of the bodily expressions of the thoughts and feelings of the rest, and hence an automatic realisation of the 'atmosphere' or significance of these aggregate thoughts and feelings. A performer or a lecturer does not necessarily take conscious note of the stillness or fidgeting of his audience, but always knows by intuition if he is holding them or no. And on the listener's side, if a soloist, or a conductor and orchestra, are working up to a furious climax, or playing a very rhythmic piece, the audience tends to follow them and intuit their mental and bodily state by becoming similarly moved. Watching the performers also helps by intuition in the apprehension of their personalities which they express in the music, and so of their contribution to the total experience, for most people would allow, for example, that a Beethoven Sonata played by Busoni was a far more valuable experience than the same Sonata played note-perfectly by an average pianist. Any intuition or attitude in one member of the performers or audience is reciprocally reinforced by all the rest if they are sympathetically inclined towards one another and similarly interested in the music. Hence it is (as Brent-Smith points out) that Kreisler cannot attempt to play good music at an ordinary 'celebrity' concert, since he realises that the audience are not in sympathy with him towards it. Several of my subjects find that they can only obtain full musical enjoyment if they are among sympathetic companions. Again, few would not admit that pleasant or suitable surroundings, even if not specifically attended to, enhance their appreciation. Thus an organ recital in a cathedral is æsthetically more valuable than the same recital in an ugly concert-hall, though the latter may be acoustically superior.

However, among the musically more advanced the whole process of musical perception is so integrated that surroundings, performers, score, &c., are often regarded as distracting, and are seldom considered in deciding whether to go to concerts. They are often able to listen 'ideally,' that is, to value the music they hear largely by their own ideas as to how it should be played rather than by how it actually is played.

Personality and the like are only too apt to become objects of interest per se; a Pachmann, for example, is more often distracting and non-musical than relevant and helpful to appreciation, in that he tends to overbalance the music. I find an interesting division between people who like singers because their personality 'gets across' and the more musical people who, conversely, dislike most singers, especially female ones, because they are trying to 'make an effect.'

This brings us at once to the rôle of gregarious factors in musical appreciation. Frank Howes has dealt with them very fully in his 'Borderland of Music and Psychology,' but has, I think, as regards musical people, considerably over-emphasised them. His thesis is, roughly, that æsthetic appreciation is impossible without the gregarious satisfaction obtained by listening to music together with a large number of other people who are similarly moved; the amount of applause is determined not by the depth of feeling or the intensity of pleasure experienced, but by the homogeneity of feeling evoked in the whole audience. He regards applause as a necessity, since the audience feels, often subconsciously, after sitting still and listening for a long time, that it must do something, hence it is psychologically unjustifiable to discourage applause between the movements of a symphony or quartet. He also states, in support of this, that true musical enjoyment can never be obtained in solitude from the gramophone or broadcast music, or from playing the pianoforte to oneself. Now it must be acknowledged that the gregarious or fellowship feeling of seeing and hearing a large orchestra, or applauding in unison with a huge audience, are highly pleasurable to most people of the more or less unmusical type. But I find that as a rule the more musical people prefer string quartets and chamber music to orchestral music; they also object to being carried away, as a large group of people so often is, or to descending with the group to a lower level in the scale of civilisation and self-control. Similarly, the desire to applaud, especially between movements, obviously becomes controlled and tends to disappear in really musical audiences, so that almost the only reasons why we do applaud, it seems to me, are convention, politeness to the performers, or the hope of getting an encore. Most of my audience, at the second concert, were glad to be relieved from it, and in general at Cambridge chamber music concerts it seldom lasts more than twenty seconds as compared with the one or two minutes that are so familiar at Promenade concerts and the like. In fact, one theory of æsthetics that contains a good deal of truth states that the essential features of the æsthetic experience are a complete equilibrium and harmony whereby there is no tendency to action at all; after it one should be as ready to do any action as willingly as any other, since all one's instincts and impulses have been satisfied, and it is only in so far as the experience is incomplete that there is a disposition towards any one action such as applause. Again, a large proportion of musical people seem to prefer to listen to broadcast or gramophone music when it is sufficiently well reproduced, and they like to play the pianoforte to themselves so as to escape these gregarious factors. However, people vary considerably in the strength of their gregarious and social tendencies, and for some this gregarious satisfaction is an essential element in their musical appreciation, and not necessarily to be condemned.

Many other non-auditory stimuli obviously affect musical appreciation, e.g., one's general comfort, recent emotional experiences, one's relative familiarity with different instruments, and various outside interests; the connection between mathematics or science and the higher appreciation of music is very marked. Hence the formalist's assumption that the artistic faculty is quite unconnected with ordinary life cannot be upheld. Temperament, personal and racial prejudices are of great importance; Parry, in his 'Art of Music,' gives several examples of the influence of environment on music. The connection is, however, obscured by the factor of compensation, as, for instance, when very submissive people seem to like very vigorous music, or very aggressive ones like sentimental stuff. The unpopularity of German music among English audiences during the war is an illustration of the effect of non-musical prejudices, though here again the more musical were less influenced in their opinions. Similarly, I attempted to show the influence of a composer's name in my second concert by having played a Nocturne by Field. Most of the audience were unable to guess the composer, or knew it already, but, as I had hoped, the remaining 18 per cent. thought it was by Chopin, and their remarks indicate all their usual prejudices for, or usually against, Chopin, e.g., 'The Victorian drawing-room atmosphere' (the piece really having been composed in about 1814).

We largely adopt our tastes from the musical minority whose opinions we respect, and reject those of the unmusical majority. But this subjective nature of musical standards is a commonplace of musical criticism which I need not emphasise.

The conclusions of the discussion may now be pointed out. As a psychologist I have no intention of entering into the controversy as to the ethics of various factors, emotion, intellect, &c., in music. I have merely tried to show that a great many apparently non-musical factors always occur in the appreciation of various people to various degrees, depending on their individual mental and temperamental peculiarities and musical training, and that they may almost all of them help in the perception of music or add to the enjoyment or value obtained. On examining the part played by such factors at the lowest and highest musical levels and in the poorest and fullest appreciation, it seems that some of them tend to disappear or to become subconscious or controlled and integrated; so that it is only attention to any one aspect (be it intellectual, emotional, gregarious, or anything else) to the detriment of or distraction from the whole, that is really non-musical. The average marks given to different categories by individual members and by the whole of my audiences demonstrate the truth; the average marks for æsthetic appeal or value of different items did not run parallel either with the marks for intellectual interest nor with those for emotion, but were almost exactly parallel with the sum of these two headings. From another approach, namely, genetic studies or case histories of several of my subjects, one finds that people usually seem to possess initially either, (a) a mainly objective, critical, or analytic attitude towards music, or, (b) a mainly subjective and emotional one. As their musical experience has developed each attitude has become more tinged with the other till they fuse in the fullest appreciation. Each person should be able to synthesise all his various dispositions, tendencies, instincts, impulses, &c., as many elements as possible being included. Thus we are justified in concluding that æsthetic appreciation, which we are now led up to viâ our examination of non-musical effects and influences, consists not so much in an absolute and definite experience that only a few highly-cultured people attain to, but in this ideal organization and synthesis.

[It is necessary to mention that an article by Leonid Sabaneev, entitled 'The Musical Receptivity of the Man in the Street,' has been published in Music and Letters since the above essay was written. Though the purport and emphasis of his work are different from mine, the identity of many of the conclusions, reached entirely independently, constitutes good evidence in their favour.]

The Grantham Philharmonic Society celebrated its sixtieth year on March 14 with a performance of Act 1 of 'Lohengrin,' ('Hiawatha's Departure,' and the 'Occasional' Overture. The soloists were Miss Ida Bloor, Mr. Trefor Jones, and Mr. John Thorne. Mr. Edward Brown conducted.

Music in the Foreign Press

ERNEST BLOCH

In the February Rassegna Musicale, Guido Pannain writes :

' Bloch's music is remarkable for its epic quality. His Symphony " Israel " recalls, in certain of its aspects, the twenty-fourth Rhapsody of the " Iliad." He is a prince among modern composers. His power lies in his immediacy—an immediacy that is a product of culture and not, as with Stravinsky, of barbarity. His String Quartet, despite a few imperfections, is masterly ; and his Pianoforte Quintet is the masterpiece of modern chamber music.'

MUSIC IN ' DON QUIXOTE '

Dr. Edgar Istel has tabulated the references to music that occur in Cervantes's masterpiece, and gives the result of his labours in the February Musik :

' Polyphonic a cappella part-songs are not mentioned, but frequent references are made to the Vihuela books of the time (which contained songs of various kinds with instrumental accompaniments, dance-tunes, and instrumental fantasies chiefly in variation form), and to various types of folk-music. Indeed, Cervantes gives more information on the instruments used by the people than any technical work of the period does.'

He divides them into pastoral, military, popular, and aristocratic. The first category comprises the Rabel (the only bow instrument mentioned in ' Don Quixote '), the Churumbela (shawm), the Gaita Zamorana (bagpipes), the Tamburin, the Sonajas (little bells), and the Albogue (a kind of cymbals). Over a dozen other types are mentioned in the other three categories, and interesting descriptions of various dances occur.

DR. WHITTAKER'S PSALM 89

In the same issue, Rudolf Bilke writes :

' If this vast, strongly expressive composition originates in practice, the efficiency of English choirs certainly deserves deep respect : for here we have something more difficult than the arduous Motets of Brahms and Reger. Interest is sustained and varied, and I warmly recommend the work to capable choral societies.'

E. T. A. HOFFMAN IN POLAND

In the February Muzyka (Warsaw), Cezary Jellenta recalls the musical activities of E. T. A. Hoffman at Warsaw, where he founded an amateur orchestra and a school of singing.

PHILIPPE DE VITRY (1291-1361)

The February Revue Musicale contains a very scholarly essay by A. Machabey on the biography of this composer.

ALEXANDRE TANSMAN

In the same issue, Raymond Petit praises the music of A. Tansman, calling attention both to the quality and the number of this young composer's works.

MODERN COMPOSERS ON THEIR OWN WORKS

In the February Pult und Taktstock, Ernst Krenek writes on three of his orchestral compositions : a Suite (Op. 43*a*), a Pot-pourri (Op. 54), and a Kleine Symphonie (Op. 58) ; Czeslav Marek explains how his ' Sinfonia Brevis ' stands with regard to both romanticism and neo-classicism ; and Max Butting devotes a couple of paragraphs to the setting of his ' Musik für Radio-Orchester ' (Op. 37), composed with special regard for conditions of broadcasting :

' I used two flutes, one oboe, one clarinet in E flat and two in B flat, one saxophone, three bassoons, two horns, three trumpets, three trombones, percussion, banjo, violins (no second violins), violas, and 'celli. I gave special attention to definition of the bass (low timbres heard through a loud-speaker are very different from what they are in the concert hall). The E flat clarinet gives brilliancy to the upper parts. The banjo plays an important rhythmic function.'

A FRENCH COMPOSER ON THE PRIX DE ROME

So many French composers have inveighed against conditions at the Villa Médicis that it is quite a relief to find one of them—Jacques de la Presle, laureate for 1921—declaring (in the Guide du Concert, March) that he greatly enjoyed his stay there, and considers that the Prix de Rome constitutes ' an extraordinary privilege.'

A FRENCH CRITIC ON BACH'S ' CHACONNE '

In the January Nouvelle Revue Musicale, Léon Vallas writes :

' To hear the famous " Chaconne " is torture for sensitive musicians. The tone of the violin, rendered abnormal by the polyphonic writing, becomes, necessarily, shrill and ugly ; the twistings of the bow, which has to give out a sustained melody on one string and simultaneously pick up rudimentary arpeggios or fragments of secondary patterns on the other strings, results in appalling discords. The true physiognomy of this strange symphony is practically never reproduced as imagined by the composer.'

A DOCUMENT ON SGAMBATI

In the February Musique, Gustav Hetsch quotes impressions of Sgambati recorded in the letters of the Danish composer Peter Heise. The two composers met in 1861, and their friendship endured until Sgambati's death (1879). One letter contains the description of a visit to a composer named Salesi, a pupil of Raimondi. Raimondi's works included a triad of oratorios entitled ' Putifar,' ' Giacobbo,' and ' Giuseppe,' written for simultaneous performance by three separate orchestras and choirs. The score was 6-ft. high, and held eighty-two staves to a page. Salesi insisted upon Heise's perusing this monumental manuscript.

A STORM AROUND THE ' FLYING DUTCHMAN '

Otto Klemperer has produced, at Berlin, Wagner's ' Flying Dutchman ' according to the original version (1844). This gave rise to a good deal of anger. For instance, in the Signale (January 23), Prof. Max Chop, under the title ' A New Outrage to a German Masterpiece,' denounces the whole production as purely grotesque. In Das Orchester (February 15) appears a protest signed by the ' Akademischer Richard Wagner Verein,' the ' Bayreuther Bund Deutscher Jugend,' and the ' Deutsche Richard Wagner Gesellschaft.' But certain critics highly praise Klemperer's initiative, and aver that it has proved successful.

For instance, in the Berliner Tageblatt (quoted in the March Musical Opinion) Dr. Alfred Einstein writes :

> ' It is not only interesting historically, but also right, that Klemperer should have presented the work in its original form . . . An unusual and magnificent performance.'

And in the February Melos, Heinrich Strobel writes :

> ' A fresh wind has blown tinsel and cobwebs away. The " Flying Dutchman " never proved so impressive, never rang so true. It remains romantic ; it is only less operatic.'

New Music

PIANOFORTE

Chester's have published some excellent ' moderately-easy ' music which deserves notice. Some months ago this house issued N. Tcherepnin's ' Dix pièces gaies,' a set of ten short pieces of unusual interest ; and their new volume of Six Pieces by Laure Choisy is in some ways to be compared with Tcherepnin's. Again there is simplicity of style and lay-out, again a freshness of outlook and real musicianship. The composer has a sense of style and a sense of humour ; the music is never obvious, and yet not far-fetched, and there is real skill in characterisation. This is a very interesting little work, and another is Robin Milford's delightful ' Sir Nicholas's Caper.' Rather like a gavotte in design, this little piece is full of humour and charm, and very effectively written. Particularly neat are the little closing gesture and the rhythmic touches that precede it. The whole thing is most attractive, and quite easy (Oxford University Press).

Rather commonplace in style is Frances Parkinson's ' Reverie ' (Augener) ; and Barter John's ' Echoes of Andalusia ' (same publisher) is somewhat obvious Spanishry, though it becomes a little more vital in its second section, ' Chueca.' Paul Irby's two ' Valses brunettes ' are published by the Wellington Music Co., and Paterson's send a volume of ' Dance Movements from Schubert,' edited and arranged by J. M. Diack.

Craxton's arrangement of Schubert's ' Nacht und Traume ' is skilfully done, and the song stands up well under the treatment. It owes little to its poem, once one knows the title, and is very telling indeed in this form. The music is its own poem, and of all songs this must be one of the best adapted to transcription (Oxford University Press).

G. M. Brewer's ' Trois Préludes ' are published by Edition Belgo-Canadienne, Montreal, and show thought and sincerity ; but there is little cohesion of style, and works of this sort need to be highly pointed if they are to be effective.

There is a good deal of beauty in Heraklit Nestoroff's Episoden (Ludwig Doblinger), and the composer is master of a luxuriant pianoforte style ; he relies too much, however, upon harmonic colourings that have lost their vividness and are beginning to pall. Pierre Vellones in ' Planisphere,' eight pianoforte pieces (Jean Jobert), attempts to portray the atmospheres of different parts of the world—mostly rather exotic—as suggested in quotations affixed to the pieces. He has vitality and imagination as well as pianistic ability, but cœlum non animam mutant qui trans mare currunt, and the composer's muse is as Parisian in ' Polynésia ' as in ' Saint-Flour.' There is some very effective and picturesque light music in this volume. The composer has a command of colour and rhythm, but as characterisations the various pieces do not go very deep.

SONGS

The issue of seven new songs by Peter Warlock shows that his hand does not lose its cunning even if he is not able always to achieve the intense kind of beauty that marks his best work. This is not to be expected and not to be desired, as there are many poems of slight texture which make attractive light songs and do not call for any great ' expense of spirit.' There are several of these among the present batch—such things as ' Tom Tyler ' (Augener) and ' Passing by ' (Oxford University Press)—which need no more than the graceful and witty touches of rhythm and harmony that the composer has put into his settings. ' The Droll Lover ' (Augener) asks more than this, and the music has nothing like the bitterness of these extremely cynical words. There are some well-known examples of bitterness in music ; one thinks of one or two Schubert songs, and of the ' Song of the Flea,' with its more and less effective settings ; but music has not often had to deal with poems as venomous as this one surely is. Perhaps I read into it meanings more sinister than it really possesses. ' The Contented Lover ' (Augener) is in Warlock's quieter style, and has a good deal of beauty in it ; and there is insight into two curious moods in the settings of two poems by Arthur Symons, ' A Prayer to St. Anthony ' and ' The Sick Heart ' (Oxford University Press). The songs are marked to be sung together, but it is doubtful whether there is any real connection or correlation between them. The second does not throw any light on the first, except in so far as both poems illustrate Symons's rather ' precious ' frame of mind. Delightful rhythmic effects are to be got from ' Elore lo ' and its clear, vivacious texture ; this song shows Warlock's gaiety and sense of musical humour in a very strong light. Augener is the publisher.

From Curwen, too, come some good songs. Holst's ' Man was dark ' is a work typical of the composer in its austerity and grip. Once it has started on its way, pianissimo, it tramps straight forward to its fortissimo ending, never turning aside to emphasise secondary meanings, but intent on the matter of the poem as a whole. What a sureness of touch in the alteration of the rhythmic basis at the ends of the stanzas, and what a great deal is achieved by that very simple device ! The song ought to have a striking effect. Very different from the severity of Holst is Armstrong Gibbs's sensitive and poetic music, but Gibbs is not less sure in his handling of the material within the limits he so firmly sets himself. There are two typically attractive songs here : ' On Duncton Hill,' with an accompaniment gently suggestive of particular aspects of the poem, gets below these aspects to the deeper meaning of the words ; and ' Resting,' though the accompaniment is less obviously suggestive, achieves just as certain an effect. The cessation of a rhythmic figure at a climax point is no new thing in song-writing, but the result here is as fresh and telling as if it were; this makes a fit ending to a beautiful song. Admirers of Armstrong Gibbs's work will be delighted with these new and typical examples.

Nicholas Gatty's 'Fain would I change that note' is less atmospheric and allusive than the music of Gibbs; it relies on a well-balanced and shapely tune, simply harmonized and plainly set, and is a very attractive song. Thomas Symons has got some of the feeling of Housman's words in his setting of 'Fancy's Knell'; he appreciates the flow of the poem and matches it in his music, which is fresh and clean in style. The deeper notes of the poem, however, are not fully audible in this setting.

Again, in Frederick Keel's 'The Mocking Fairy' the music does not get beneath the surface of the words. The point of de la Mare's poem is in what it implies rather than says, and the music here seems to deal exclusively with the superficial meaning of the words (Cramer).

Two effectively written Irish songs are Percival Garrett's 'Irish Love' and 'Southern Love Poem,' published in one cover by Cramer; and Evelyn Sharpe's 'Fionnphort Ferry' (same publisher), much lighter in texture, has clarity and point. Louis Drakeford's 'Bittersweet' (Winthrop Rogers) is luxuriant in lay-out, but excessively commonplace in style; and Frank Bridge's 'The Primrose' (Keith Prowse), though neat in style, is not in any real way typical of its composer. George M. Brewer's 'If she but knew' (Edition Belgo-Canadienne, Montreal) is a sincerely-felt work, and shows obvious signs of care in accentuation and general style.

VIOLIN

The sight of a new Violin Concerto thrills me; having been an eye-witness of the decline of the Vieuxtemps and Wieniawsky fashion, of the forlorn hope of Tchaikovsky, of the débacle of Reger, I still live in hope that one of the many moderns who seek to revive old patterns will write a Violin Concerto showing something of the real genius of the instrument. This is an important point, but too often overlooked in spite of the obvious significance of the successes won in other days by men who had little to say but could say it in a manner that showed the 'points' of the instrument. And in this respect Otto Siegl's Concerto (Ludwig Doblinger, Vienna) is, technically at least, fairly satisfactory.

Less consonant with the genius of the instrument is the somewhat dry nature of the themes. Perhaps, if the work is finely scored, we shall speak of austerity and not of dryness. The hints of the orchestration given in the pianoforte part are not sufficiently explicit. But I have the impression that as the harmonies now and again recall a chastened Reger, so the ensemble may err in the same way and remind me of the opaque texture peculiar to that composer. The work, nevertheless, is certainly interesting. There is no key-signature; the first movement is in G major, the second in E minor; the third in A major—harmless eccentricities.

Not quite so harmless are the eccentricities of Heraklit Nestoroff, whose 'Nocturno' (Ludwig Doblinger) seems to be 'asking for it.' No doubt Mr. Nestoroff will maintain that by writing very difficult music he means to attract the virtuoso and not the amateur. But there are limits even to the capacity of the virtuoso, and certain passages (especially near the climax) seem a tempting of Providence. These double-stoppings are quite possible in the study; they are improbable in the concert room, because the least anxiety or purely physical causes, like a perspiring or a cold hand, would inevitably result in a technical imperfection.

Compositions of a more unassuming character but of some merit are Hugo Anson's 'Idyll' (Curwen) and 'O can ye sew cushions,' an old Scots lullaby arranged by Alec Rowley (Leonard Gould & Bolttler).

CHAMBER MUSIC

Anything bearing the name of Franz Schubert arrests attention. But the 'Sonate für Arpeggione,' arranged for 'cello or viola and pianoforte (Doblinger) will not arrest it for long. Nothing here recalls the Schubert we love; not a touch of the simple charm of the Sonatinas and not a hint of the glamour of the Quartets or of the easy freedom of the 'Rondo brillant.' If the Sonata has been long neglected, the reason is pretty obvious. The pianoforte part has a guide for arpeggione or viola written in the key of G; it is rather disconcerting to a reader who imagines the viola player at grips with passages that would be high on the violin. The solo part, of course, is written in the tenor key.

A Sonata for pianoforte and violin by Gustav Donath (Doblinger) shows an easy and fluent style devoid of abstrusities, and in consequence deserves to be commended. The general impression is pleasant, if not arresting; and since we are spared the shocks we must not grumble if we do not find the thrills of original work.

Three pieces for string quartet by Armstrong Gibbs are published in score (Curwen), which make interesting reading. They show the light hand and graceful style that we expect in this composer's music.

UNISON

Walter Adrian's 'Perseverance' (words and music by one man) is a march-song, rather trite in its tune and apt to stick at the phrase ends, where the pianoforte might help to work up the excitement by putting in a joining-phrase. In short, it is the sort of piece that nine out of ten musicians would improvise at the pistol's point: which does not necessarily mean that it is poor, only that it could with some ingenuity be improved. After all, Parry and one or two others have set their followers a hard task. To words by the same author as above, Edgar Moy has set a melody that jingles pleasantly. 'Queer Animals' is the title, and the song will suit fairly small people. Most of these little ditties for little folk shy at rhythmic variety, which I think rather a pity. It is so easy to fall into the jog-trot, and into bad accentuation, when trying to be very simple.

'Words and music by' is catching. Maud Stewart-Baxter writes both in 'Freedom,' another of the songs moving in bold march style and designed for mass singing. This has a good lift. It should be noted that its spirit is religious—a prayer to the God of Freedom. However well the composer may strive, almost invariably some phrase creeps in that one remembers, note for note, somewhere else. Mr. Adrian, for example, has four pianoforte bars at the beginning of his song almost exactly reproducing the start of the 'Harmonious Blacksmith' tune, and Miss Stewart-

Baxter's concluding phrase has an equally familiar ring, though I can't place it. Anyone who has ever laid pen to ruled paper knows only too well that one is apt to set down phrases that seem, when written, quite original, but that have some basis in a work that lingers at the back of the mind. I remember once writing for my coach a little organ piece that I rather liked, and being greatly taken aback to have it commended, with the reservation that Guilmant had said almost exactly the same thing, rather better. So he had, in one of his earlier organ pieces that had gone, as I thought, quite out of my head, but which had reproduced part of itself under my unconscious hand. So I don't grumble at these recollections in tranquillity; only I wish that they oftener carried with them more emotion and power. The last song of this Cramer batch is by the editor of the series, Martin Shaw —'The Song of the Music Makers.' This also does not go far out of the familiar 'uplift' tracks, but it swings well, and says what it has to say cleanly. That top G on 'joy' ought to raise the roof. One little point about the printing. This song takes two pages only, but the publishers sell eight, the other six containing only advertisements. One sheet of paper would have been ample; then, perhaps, the song could have been sold at less than fourpence.

'O welcome in our midst' is another song by Martin Shaw, a broad 'song of greeting' wherewith to compliment a new Head, or parson, or organist. Dr. Dearmer's words are a good hand-grip (Curwen).

Herbert Howells goes to Chaucer for 'Good Counsel.' This begins, 'Fly from the press,' but I cannot commend that; if all did, my occupation would be gone. There is salty savour in the ancient advice to seek truth, and to begin at home: 'Rede well thyself, that other folk canst rede.' In all Howells does there is something a little different from anyone else's phraseology. That is clear gain when, as here, the straight end of the business in hand is seen all along. His songs are not perfectly simple, but this one presents no large difficulty. The pianist who can handle big chords sonorously will enjoy his part as well as the singers theirs (Rogers).

A cheap edition of a gracious air from Handel's 'Rodelinda' is welcome. Dr. Whittaker edits it. The music, a lovely strain of hope and longing for an absent one, flows beneficently in 12-8, in broad phrases, to be stroked and fondled. This should become a favourite (Oxford University Press).

PART-SONGS FOR CHILDREN'S AND FEMALE VOICES

Ernest Newton has arranged Schubert's 'Cradle Song' in two parts, the lower of which needs the low B flat to keep the tune's outline. This is an unpretentious setting. At the end are printed some questions and answers about the music (Gould & Bolttler).

Some new arrangements from Handel are entitled: 'O the pleasure of the plains' (from 'Acis'), 'Now the lusty spring is seen' (from 'Jephtha'), 'Come, ever smiling Liberty' (from 'Judas'), and 'Sweet Day' (to Herbert's words). The first three are for s.c., the last for s.s.c. The first is gay, with runs and some staccato; the second is somewhat similar in style and difficulty; the third slower, and more gently-flowing, in 6-8; and the last a very easy piece, in which the lowest voice needs a sound G. The two-part pieces in particular afford excellent technical practice, besides well-founded pleasure in good tunes and shapely phrasing (Paterson).

There is no need to urge the value to part-building and weaving of the practice of canons and rounds. Here is a series of packets of these capital tabloids, which Dr. Whittaker brings out. There are six sets, all by Mozart, each set containing from two to five pieces. Most of them are short, but No. 18, 'The Death of the Nightingale,' covers five pages. This is a clever and expressive chromatic essay, reminding me a little, in spirit, of the fine chromatic fugue for two pianofortes. Fresh words have been written by Albert Latham where that seemed desirable. There is all manner of variety in style and impulse here. Set 2 will give as good an idea as any of the scope of the smaller pieces. Each set costs threepence. The lot bound in one cover may be had for 1*s.* 6*d.* (Oxford University Press).

Another canon is Eric Thiman's, entitled 'I have twelve oxen'—the words that John Ireland made familiar in his happy setting as a solo song. Thiman's is a neatly tripping tune. With this song is printed another—G. Rathbone's 'The Fairies' Forest' (unison), for slow, legato singing, tip-toed lightly (Novello).

Alec Rowley's latest is a set of old sea songs, arranged for s.s. with independent accompaniment. The titles are: 'The heaving of the lead,' 'We be three poor mariners,' 'The Jovial Sailor,' 'The Arethusa,' 'Then farewell, my trim-built wherry,' and 'The Mermaid.' All are brisk, the liveliest being the even numbers. The second part has always points of contrapuntal interest, and it sometimes crosses the upper voice—a good thing to do. A pleasant collection of tuneful ditties that middle-aged children will widely appreciate (Rogers).

MIXED-VOICE

Armstrong Gibbs's 'La Belle Dame sans Merci' (Keats) is for s.a.t.b. choir, with orchestra. For the first part of the knight's story, given to male voices in three parts, either tenors or basses are to be divided, preferably the basses. The music has the imaginative flexibility we expect from this sensitive composer; in line and colour it swiftly seconds the poetry. The work is short and full of meat, and only difficult in that it needs fine adjustment and balance. Choirs able to think fully of these things, after having quickly learnt the notes, should certainly try the ballad (Curwen).

CHURCH MUSIC

Three settings of the Communion Service, each an admirable example of its type, may be cordially recommended. Charles W. Pearce's 'Missa SS. Clementis et Martini' is intended for community unison, or choral s.a.t.b. singing. It is based on Psalm Tones and other Church melodies, and should be readily picked up by the people, while the simple, dignified harmonies present the minimum of difficulty if part-singing is preferred (Faith Press). A Short and Easy Communion Service in A flat, by C. Hylton Stewart, is written for parish church choirs. It is straightforwardly set, with no repetition of words, and the part-writing, while never lacking in interest, is quite easy. The organ part, except, of course, in the occasional unison passages, mainly duplicates the voice parts. This attractive little setting—short, well-written, and devotional—is just the type that many churches are now needing (Oxford University Press). Choirs and organists looking for something which makes more demands upon their capabilities will probably be interested in T. Tertius Noble's Short Communion Service in A and E (Arthur P. Schmidt Co., New York). This is a well-planned setting, with interesting and effective vocal writing of only moderate difficulty, and a free, well-developed accompaniment. All the above settings are complete, and include both forms of the Kyrie.

An excellent addition to the Oxford University Press Cathedral Anthems series, edited by C. Hylton Stewart, is William Boyce's 'The Heavens declare the Glory of God.' This is a long work in various sections, filling twenty-four pages. The first movement—for A.T.B. (verse)—is contrapuntal, with a fair amount of florid work. Then follow solos for alto ('Their sound is gone out') and bass ('In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun'). The full chorus enters for the first time in a simple, massive setting of 'Great and marvellous,' and the work ends with a brief, vigorous treatment of 'Hallelujah' for A.T.B. (verse) and chorus.

An arrangement for S.S.A.A. of the Chorale 'Let all men praise the Lord,' from Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise,' has just been added to Novello's octavo edition of trios, &c., for female voices. In its new form this popular movement should be sure of a wide welcome.

An easy setting in C of Benedicite Omnia Opera, by Alfred J. Silver, is in chant form, and comes from Curwen's. This house sends also Arthur F. Tate's anthem, 'The Lord is my Light.' It contains some simple, robust chorus work of a conventional type, and a tuneful section for soprano solo and quartet. The music, however, does not rise above the commonplace. G. G.

Messrs. Novello have in the press a new choral work by Arthur Bliss entitled, 'Pastoral: Lie strewn the white flocks.' It is a setting of poems from various sources, ancient and modern, for mixed choir, soprano solo, flute solo, strings, and timpani. The first performance will be given by the Harold Brooke Choir at its next concert, at Bishopsgate Institute, on May 8.

Gramophone Notes

By 'Discus'

H.M.V.

A substantial selection from 'Siegfried' (D1530-35) and 'The Rhinegold' (D1319 and D1546) reaches a fine standard, with some splendid solo singing. The 'Siegfried' singers are Frida Leider, Maria Olczewska, Rudolf Laubenthal, and Emil Schipper. In the four 'Rhinegold' excerpts we have Friedrich Schorr in the Finale of the opera (D1319), and on the companion disc a group of English singers—Mesdames Suddaby, Trenton, and Walker as the Rhinemaidens, and Walter Widdop as Loge and Arthur Fear as Alberich and Wotan. The orchestras are the L.S.O. and the Berlin State, and the conductors Albert Coates, Leo Blech, and Karl Alwyn. Altogether, here is about eighty minutes of splendid stuff, about as well performed and recorded as can reasonably be desired.

The orchestration of de Falla invariably comes off well per gramophone, and three records of 'Nights in the Garden of Spain' are above the average for colour and clarity. The important part for the pianoforte is played by Madame van Barentzen, and is about as good an example as exists of the use of the instrument as a constituent of the orchestra. The orchestra is that vague body known as the 'Symphony,' and the conductor M. Coppola. On the odd side of the third record the pianist plays brilliantly a solo—de Falla's 'Andaluza' (D1569-71).

The Ballet music from Massenet's 'Le Cid' seems rather conventional after the Wagner and de Falla, but it contains some attractive things, and the recording is first-rate. Players: New Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Eugène Goossens (C1638-39).

Bach's Sonata in E, for violin and pianoforte, is played by Isolde Menges and Harold Samuel, with the excellent results that we look for save in one respect—the power variety of the violinist is rather less than that of the pianist, so that at times both balance and interest suffer slightly. Otherwise this is a delightful effort (C1632-33).

Four more Etudes of Chopin have been recorded by Backhaus—Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, and 8 from Op. 25. Nothing more need be said than that they are well up to the fine standard of their predecessors (DB1179).

The records of Beethoven's A flat Sonata, Op. 110, played by Lamond, are the best I have heard from this player. Tone is far better than usual, and his performance is so clear and well-proportioned as to make one wonder how this sonata could ever have bothered folk, either by its mood or construction (D1565-66).

Chaliapin, greatly daring, sings a couple of songs in English—Coningsby Clarke's 'The Blind Ploughman' and Malashkin's 'Oh, could I but express in song.' His English is about on a par with most English singers' adventures with foreign tongues. In other words, a good deal of it is unintelligible and the rest distorted. And he makes operatic scenas of both songs (DA993).

John Goss and the Cathedral Male-Voice Quartet in four shanties are their usual selves in 'Johnny, come down to Hilo' and three other shanties (B2940).

COLUMBIA

For Delius enthusiasts nothing better has been done in the way of recording than the latest issue —'Summer Night on the River,' played by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra under Beecham. As a rule, I feel that much of the essence of this composer eludes the gramophone; here it has been captured in an unusual degree (D1638).

The same orchestra, Ansermet conducting, gives us the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, with Fanny Davies as soloist. Here is pianoforte-playing truly admirable in its point and rhythmic life. Some occasional lack of balance between pianoforte and orchestra must be laid at Schumann's door. He will keep his band going, whether there is anything for them to say or not. For longish stretches there is not, so they often do no more than get in the pianist's way. The pianoforte tone is of average fair quality; the recording is first-rate (9616-19).

In Debussy's 'Nuages' and 'Fêtes'—especially the latter—we have some of the finest recording of the month. The orchestra is that of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, Paris, conducted by Philippe Gaubert (9656-57). The same forces work with equally good result in Ravel's 'La Valse' (L2245-46). For records of these representative French works we need look no farther.

Weingartner and the Basle Symphony Orchestra are heard in a straightforward performance of the 'Freischütz' Overture. As this fills three sides, there was an opening for some unhackneyed short piece. But we don't get it. The 'Rosamund' Entr'acte is once more led out (9644-45).

Chamber music is a very strong suit this month, with Brahms's Clarinet Quintet heading the list on all grounds. The players are the Léner Quartet with Charles Draper, and the recording is unusually good, especially in the matter of delicacy (L2228-2232).

After this serenely beautiful work comes the cheeky Trio for pianoforte, oboe, and bassoon of Poulenc, played by the composer, M. Lamorlette, and G. Dherin. The crisp dryness of this is highly attractive for those who don't want anything else. The recording is tip-top (L2223-24).

In Beethoven's 'Harp' Quartet we have some fine and sensitive playing by the Capet String Quartet. But I feel that their pace in the Scherzo is excessive, and I have never heard the three quavers so consistently coming out as a triplet (L2248-51).

A batch of viola solos leaves me with mixed feelings. A solo instrument with so limited a repertory must needs be catered for by transcriptions; but we expect a musician of the standing of Tertis to be scrupulous in the choice and disposition of material. Tchaikovsky's 'Chant sans paroles' and Rubinstein's Melody in F sound well, though played rather too quickly; but why should Rubinstein's harmony be 'improved'? (5230.) Brahms's 'Minnelied' and Mendelssohn's 'On wings of song' seem to lose by being divorced from their words, and in neither case is the arrangement happy. Tertis's playing will make ample amends so far as most listeners are concerned; nevertheless . . . (D1637).

An important enterprise is launched in the recording of the first nine Preludes and Fugues in the 'Forty-eight,' played by Harriet Cohen. There is room for two opinions in regard to her fugue-playing, and I give mine for what it is worth. Ought the subject to be obtruded at every entry? Miss Cohen evidently thinks it should be. Many of us differ. The case was excellently put by Tovey, in his Preface to the Associated Board edition of the 'Forty-eight': 'Much pianistic fugue-playing has passed as "scholarly" when it even fails to reach that definition, inasmuch as it "brings out the subject" as if all the rest of the fugue were unfit for publication. This notion is peculiar to pianists.' It is clearly Miss Cohen's notion, and it spoils my pleasure in her fugue-playing. Tovey might have gone on to point out that players who soloise the subject over-much fail to realise that a fugue is a conversation between equals, not a monologue or an ostinato; and that two of the chief products of fugal writing—harmony and texture—are sacrificed when too much is made of any one part throughout. This is not to deny that there are cases where prominence in the subject is good. For example, an augmented bass entry, such as that tremendous one in bar 73 of the C sharp minor in Book 1, can hardly be over-emphasised. Like the final pedal entry in the 'St. Anne' Fugue, it ought to be fired off with cannon. Augmented entries generally need some help, and nobody will object to being made just aware of entries by middle voices, especially when the subject is slow. (Quick ones can take care of themselves.) Miss Cohen's playing of the Preludes is first-rate. The piece in D major especially is touched-off to perfection. Tone generally is average; the pace in some of the fugues is on the slow side, e.g., the D major and C sharp minor. It is a pity that certain fugues do not appear on the same discs as their Preludes; the widely-varying lengths set up difficulties, of course (L2239-44).

Mandolines and guitars are regarded as rather footling instruments; but it is clear that much depends on the music they play. One of the most attractive records of the month is that of the Madami Instrumental Quartet (two guitars and two mandolines) playing arrangements of Scarlatti's well-known 'Tempo di ballo' in D and a 'Balletto' by Martini. The crispness is delightful, and the harpsichordy effect (especially in the Scarlatti piece) is just right (5232).

A few vocal records must be mentioned. W. F. Watt is well suited by a couple of Moore's Irish Melodies, arranged by Hughes—'Has sorrow thy young days shaded?' and 'No, not more welcome.' His words are excellent, and he has a good long phrase (5235).

An astonishing contralto voice is that of Marie Braslau. Often it is masculine in quality, and almost always it is used at full power. She sings —perhaps I should say she releases—a song by Rubinstein (in Russian) and (in Italian) a cantata by Bassani, arranged by Malipiero. Those who like to be overpowered will enjoy them: I don't (L2226).

Louis Graveure sings airs from 'Tosca' and 'Rigoletto.' He was a baritone, and is now a tenor. I never heard him as a baritone, but this example of his tenor-singing—over-portamento'd, sobbing, and noisy—makes me feel sure that (for an obvious reason) he was better as he was (5211).

The gramophonist who wants to get the utmost pleasure and profit from his records will be helped by 'The Golden Treasury of Recorded Music,' by Alec Robertson, vol. 1 of which has recently been issued. This first instalment deals with Bach (seven works—choral, pianoforte, organ, and concerted) and Beethoven (five works—pianoforte, chamber music, orchestral, and concerted). Mr. Robertson writes attractively; there are plenty of music-type illustrations; and the value of the booklet is greatly helped by a bibliography, &c. (The Gramophone Company, 1*s*.).

Player-Piano Notes

ÆOLIAN

Audiographic : Duo-Art.—The last three rolls of Stravinsky's 'Fire Bird' have now been issued, and the interest is well maintained, the fifth roll being, in fact, one of the most attractive of the batch. This set of six is a real achievement in every way, and sets a standard in musical, personal, and literary interest that will not easily be surpassed (D765-69).

The other half-dozen Audiographic rolls are of a good level of excellence; there is not one example of a performance below first-rate, and all are well cut. Chaminade's 'Undine' is in her usual engaging vein, and her playing is rhythmical and fluent. Noel Gallon has written the introduction (D797).

Myra Hess plays the beautiful little Andante from Beethoven's Sonata in G, Op. 79, Egerton Lowe being responsible for the notes (D793).

There is a Brahms Intermezzo (E flat), played by Harold Bauer, with notes by Forbes Milne (D773); and a good, crisp performance of Moussorgsky's 'Gopak' is given by Gita Gradova, to which Markham Lee has added a poetical commentary (D801).

Marguerite Volavy plays Schumann's Arabesque. This has an introduction by Egerton Lowe, and notes on the structure of the music by the Æolian editorial staff (D745).

Particularly delightful is Liszt's 'St. Francis preaching to the birds.' The playing, as in the others of this batch, is excellent, and the drawings, together with Kirkham Jones's simple explanation, make it still more attractive (D771).

Duo-Art.—The outstanding rolls are arrangements for pianoforte duet of Mendelssohn's 'Fingal's Cave' Overture (515), and Delius's 'Winter Landscape' and 'Dance,' Nos. 2 and 3 from 'North-Country Sketches' (7191). Rudolph Ganz and Ernest Hutcheson are responsible for the Mendelssohn, and a capital performance it is. In the Delius, Percy Grainger and Ralph Leopold maintain the high standard they set themselves in the first roll of these sketches. Their playing is especially good in the 'Winter Landscape.'

Frederic Lamond gives us the Finale of Tchaikovsky's E minor Symphony. The whole of this transcribed Symphony is successful, though naturally it is a little unequal, the slow movement lending itself less well to keyboard treatment than the others (522).

There is a lively selection from 'The Beggar's Opera,' played by Robert Armbruster (7185), who plays also a Nocturne by Bohm (7243).

An attractive piece of the superior salon type is Juon's 'Humoresque,' Op. 12, No. 3. Leonid Kreutzer's performance is delightfully crisp and neat (0347).

Hand-played.—First-rate is Rudolph Ganz's playing of Liszt's fifteenth Hungarian Rhapsody. This is one of the best of the Rhapsodies, and seems to be comparatively unfamiliar. As it makes liberal use of the 'Rakoczy' March, one would expect it to have attained the popularity it deserves. This is a brilliant roll (A1139*f*).

Chopin's Polonaise in B flat makes another good roll, being excellently played by Ignaz Friedman (A1137*e*).

Kreisler's 'Liebeslied' is so well transcribed by Rachmaninov that it has all the effect of a good pianoforte piece. A better performance than that of Backhaus could not reasonably be desired (A1135*e*).

The first roll of Schumann's Symphonic Studies, played by Percy Grainger, is notably clear and well varied. Students who are at work on these fine studies would profit greatly by a few hearings of this excellent roll (A1141*e*).

Nothing in this month's output is better than the roll of Debussy's 'The Island of Joy,' brilliantly played by Arthur Rubinstein. The listener's introduction and running commentary are by Percy Scholes (D779).

BLÜTHNER

Wijsmann's playing has already been warmly praised in these columns, so it is unnecessary to say more than that is well up to his usual high standard in the fine Liszt Ballad No. 2. It is a picturesque affair, full of fire and colour—Liszt at his best. There are two rolls, both clear and well cut (8130*a-b*).

Whatever may be said in disparagement of Schumann as an orchestral composer, he is still a power among piano-lovers. They will welcome the three rolls of his 'Faschingsschwank,' played by Paula Hegner. Her performance is finely varied and virile (57339-40*b*).

Early Verdi is not the best possible fare for the pianoforte transcriber, but Szendrei, with his brilliant playing, makes as much as possible of a selection from 'La Traviata' (59767-68).

There is also a Valse by Waldau—good, though not highly original. It is well played by Waldemar Sacks (59375).

The only Ordinary roll is of a very good four-hand arrangement of Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture. It gives plenty of scope for varied effects, and will provide the ardent player-pianist with some exciting and enjoyable work (55670).

Wireless Notes

By 'Ariel'

I was unable to contribute any Notes in the March issue, or my February remarks on the transmission of organ music would have been followed by a prompt recantation. It is not too late to return to the subject now, I hope.

By a coincidence, there began almost simultaneously a correspondence in The Times on the subject. On February 4 a letter appeared wherein the writer pointed out that the pedal notes were inaudible. He said that this was because 'these notes were produced by comparatively slow vibrations, and the instrument does not carry them.' Whereupon three days later a correspondent from Baldock replied that the pedal notes could be heard satisfactorily if the receiving set and loud-speaker were carefully designed :

'A moving-coil loud-speaker with a suitable receiver will not only give the pedal notes of the organ, and those of the double-bass and timpani of the orchestra, but will afford a quality of reproduction which compares very favourably with the original performance. Fairly realistic results can also be obtained from gramophone records played through such equipment by means of an electric pick-up, deep notes being reproduced which are not audible with an ordinary gramophone.'

On the following day appeared a letter from the chief engineer of the B.B.C., containing some scientific particulars which I repeat for the benefit of the readers who dabble easily in such mysteries. He said :

'The range of frequencies covered by the average pipe-organ is approximately from 16 to 6,500 cycles a second. Efficient receiving sets will record, and should reproduce faithfully, the frequencies from 50 to 8,000 cycles a second. The new type of B.B.C. transmitter covers a range of frequencies from 30 to 10,000 cycles a second.'

A clerical reader at Oxford wrote mentioning that the late Dr. Davan Wetton had agreed with him that organ music by wireless usually sounded like 'a huge harmonium overblown, the deep pedal tones being strangely ineffective.' Dr. Wetton added that 'at the final service at the Foundling, which was very successfully relaid, he had the microphone so placed as to give the pedals a good hearing.' This correspondent went on to say that the finest organ transmission he had heard was from Liverpool Cathedral ; 'the pedal notes were quite thrilling.' (This is true ; but what of the rapid manual passages ?)

I discussed the question with a B.B.C. official shortly after these letters appeared. He contended that organ music was transmitted faithfully, but received imperfectly owing to the deficiencies of the normal domestic set. I soon found that his claim was justified. Within a day or two of writing my February notes (in which I said that Mr. Leonard Warner's Bach Chorale Prelude recitals came out badly blurred) I had an opportunity of going into one of the Savoy Hill waiting-rooms where a set was installed. By good luck I arrived just as Mr. Warner was playing the last of his Bach programmes, and I was at once convinced that organ music can be broadcast with excellent results.

Readers must therefore memorise those frequencies, and ask for, and see that they get, sets capable of handing them out.

One conclusion emerges from the discussion : a large proportion of listeners have yet to make the acquaintance of the organ and its repertory. The almost total absence of the pedal part is only one of two fatal defects, the other being the blurring of the manual work in rapid or complicated passages.

Readers will have observed that on March 17 the Bach Cantata 'Wailing, crying,' had a second performance, the first having taken place a fortnight or so before. This was not a mistake, but the beginning of a new scheme whereby certain (at least) of the Cantatas will be broadcast twice, with a few weeks' interval between the performances. This is a good move, and one that might well be applied to other new and unfamiliar works. A glance through the programmes for a month will usually show a good deal of repetition of light items, but little or none in the case of works that really need it, for the sake of both listeners and performers.

A Cardiff reader kindly sends us particulars of the recent carrying-out in that city of an experiment which, if developed, may raise one more little unemployment problem for musicians. The occasion was an International Fraternal Conference held under the auspices of the Royal Order of Moose, at which (it need hardly be said) many American and Canadian delegates were present. The ceremony took place in the City Hall, and being of a quasi-religious character, called for organ accompaniment. Unfortunately, the hall has no organ. A pianoforte was out of the question, not only on the score of fitness, but also because of its inadequacy for controlling the singing of fifteen hundred men. An orchestra was also ruled out, because attendance was necessarily restricted to members of the Order. It was therefore decided to attempt to relay from the organ of a church about a mile away. The Director of the Cardiff station of the B.B.C. entered whole-heartedly into the experiment. Communication was established between the church and the hall, and the organist was provided with headphones to enable him to hear the singing he was to accompany. I have not space to go into the other technical details. To make a long story short, the result (in spite of the absence of rehearsal) was extraordinarily successful. Several loud-speakers in the hall transmitted the organ with fine effect, and report says that 'a real Cathedral atmosphere' was created, which added a great deal to the impressiveness of the ceremony. Even the most up-to-date of the Americans present were astonished at the success of this piece of long-range accompanying.

For some years I have speculated as to the identity of a Bach 'Prelude, Chorale, and Fugue' much played by military and brass bands. On March 17 I heard it at last in the programme played by the Wireless Military Band. It turns out to be the C sharp minor Prelude from Book 1 of the 'Forty-eight,' a Chorale which I could not identify (thanks to the distorted rhythm and exaggerated pauses and rests at the end of the lines) and the 'Great' G minor Organ Fugue. The Prelude, with its intimate and elegiac expression, is ill-suited to the military band—at all events it sounded coarse and far too loud in this performance. (Why not use the Prelude (Fantasia) Bach wrote for the Fugue ? Nothing more suitable can be imagined.)

As if enough vandalism had not been committed by this misfit of a 'Forty-eight' Prelude with an organ fugue, the arranger had proceeded to cap his iniquity by working the chorale melody into the texture of the fugue, with disastrous results, the fugue being practically killed by the brazen delivery of the cantus firmus. The name of the perpetrator of this travesty was not given in the Radio Times, nor was there any information as to the identity of the component movements. It is good that our military and brass bands should play transcriptions of Bach, but it is bad that their favourite transcription should be one showing such poor taste and so little respect for the original. Savoy Hill conductors might well keep a wider-open eye on transcriptions of classics; and the Radio Times should give the source, and (above all) the transcriber's name, so that we should know whom to bless or curse.

Occasional Notes

We congratulate the two musicians who received New Year honours—Dr. Arthur Somervell, who becomes a knight, and Delius, who is made a Companion of Honour. But we hope it is not ungracious to express the dissatisfaction which we know is felt by most musicians as to the inadequacy of the honour conferred on Delius. Nothing less than the Order of Merit should have been given him.

The arrangements for the Anglo-American Conference at Lausanne in August are now almost complete. We are able to give in full the lists of lecturers and chairman on the English side (it will be remembered that the plan is for the English and Americans to work on a fifty-fifty basis):

Dr. W. G. Whittaker ...	'The Use of Classical Song in School Work.'
Percy A. Scholes ...	'On Good and Bad in Music.
Edwin Evans	'What the Modern Movement in Composition means to the Teacher.'
C. W. Saleeby (Chairman of the 'Sunlight League')	'Music as Medicine.'
Dr. Edward C. Bairstow	'The Training of Church Choirs.'

In addition, Jaques-Dalcroze is giving a special talk on Eurhythmics.

For the sectional meetings the following chairmen have been chosen:

G. E. Linfoot... ...	'Elementary School Music.'
A. Forbes Milne ...	'Secondary School Music.'
Prof. F. H. Shera ...	'University Music.'
Harvey Grace ...	'Church Music.'
Steuart Wilson ...	'Vocal Teaching and Choral Training'.
Ernest Fowles ...	'Pianoforte Teaching.'
Clement Spurling ...	'Orchestral Work in Schools.'
Dr. W. G. Whittaker...	'Competition Festivals.'

As the early booker catches the best accommodation, readers who have not yet obtained a prospectus should do so without delay. Copies may be had from the Registrar, Musicians' Holiday Conference, 2, Albany Courtyard, Piccadilly, W.1.

Mr. Felix Weingartner will personally direct two courses of Conducting classes at Basle Conservatory—a beginners' course from October 1, 1929, to June 30, 1930, and a master-class for advanced students in June, 1930. Advanced students will have the benefit of working with a full professional orchestra. In addition to the regular lessons, meetings, and discussions, students are admitted to Weingartner's rehearsals both in the concert-room and the theatre; for specially gifted students there will be the possibility of taking part in these events.

As will be seen in our advertisement columns, Messrs. Novello have taken over the publication of all the Church music and choral compositions of Sir Walford Davies. Included in these works are 'The Song of St. Francis,' 'The Five Sayings of Jesus,' 'High Heaven's King,' &c. Among the Church music are the unaccompanied Morning and Evening Service in C, the Festal Morning and Evening Service in G, the Férial Morning, Evening, and Communion Service in F, various anthems, &c.

The analogy between the 'advanced' composer and the truly emancipated poet is sufficiently close to justify our quotation of a couple of samples from the latest flights of Gertrude Stein and Ezra Pound. Here is Miss Stein, as insistent as ever—a kind of small-scale (or perhaps we should say small-bore) ostinato:

'It is it is it is it is it.

'If it and as if it, if it or as if it, if it is as if it, and it is as if it and as if it. Or as if it. More as if it. As more. As more as if it. And if it.

'And for and as if it.

'If it was to be a prize a surprise if it was to be a surprise to realise, if it was to be if it were to be, was it to be. What was it to be. It was to be what it was. And it was. So it was. As it was. As it is. Is it as it as. It is and as it is and as it is.

'And so and so as it was.

'Keep it in sight alright.'

We will; we will! In fact, we are pasting it up on the wall facing our desk, where it will be quite 'alright.'

Mr. Pound is less loquacious—indeed he is not loquacious at all. He goes straight to the point, repeating nothing, and leaving much—everything, in fact—to the reader's imagination:

'Papyrus

'Spring . . . . .
Too long . . . .
Gongula . . . . ,

We have nothing to say concerning Gongula (which we believe to be one of the more pungent breeds of cheese), but we dissent as to the length of Spring; it is both too short and too late. But perhaps, after all, the reference may be to the cheese.

In a recent issue of the Musical Courier appeared a substantial paragraph headed 'About Ourselves,' wherein, after detailing the almost monotonous regularity with which the journal has been on the side of the angels, the writer proceeded: 'This is perhaps the right moment to remind our readers that the Musical Courier is the oldest active, tonal journal in the world, and the only one that has never missed publication of a single issue in the half century of its successful existence.' Not quite the oldest in the world!

We dislike sounding fanfares on behalf of ourselves, but the truth must be told, so dropping our voice to a modest murmur, we point out that the Musical Times is now in its eighty-fifth year. We hope it is tonal; indulgent friends frequently tell us it is active; and it has never missed a single issue in the eighty odd years of its—shall we say successful? Yes; we think we may—successful existence. raising our head and our voice again, we add, that when the Musical Courier catches us up we shall be the first to extend the glad hand.

Teachers' Department

A MODERN APPROACH TO MUSIC-TEACHING:

III.—THE ATTITUDE OF THE TEACHER: HIS PSYCHOLOGY AND AIMS

By Norah H. Bore

'What is my aim in teaching?' A concrete example will, perhaps, best explain the practical bearings of this question. A teacher taught for years with a sense of failure. Fellow-members of the staff achieved results which she could not produce. She measured her work against theirs, only to aggravate the feeling of humiliation which at times made teaching a nightmare. Her efforts equalled, if they did not exceed, theirs; her ability and training were as good, yet her results seemed negligible in comparison with what they obtained by a much smaller expenditure of nervous energy. There seemed only one way out of her difficulty: she decided to give up teaching, but circumstances conspired to prevent the carrying out of this decision. Chance discussion raised the question: 'What is my aim in teaching?' Curiosity suggested the need for an answer, and she was surprised to discover that the search for it had at the same time solved her difficulties. She realised that she had been measuring the results of her work in terms of things for which she was not working. It was as if she had been teaching French and had estimated her results by an examination in German. In her work examination results and technical achievement had been wholly subordinated to the wider issue of awakening musical interest and of allowing the pupil to develop musically along individual lines. Work such as this needs to be viewed in a larger perspective than that of termly or even yearly examinations, and disappointment was inevitable when such arbitrary standards were applied.

This piece of mental reassessment produced remarkable revaluations. Results which, viewed by the old standards, seemed failures, now appeared to be brilliant successes. The teacher recognised that a tacit antagonism to the current examination system had largely shaped her teaching; she discovered that she had an especial gift for awakening musical enthusiasm in pupils of mediocre talent. Having thus estimated her particular faculty, she was able to see where her talent had misled her. She started to evolve the necessary technique needed to correct this, so that she was able to handle more talented children.

The moral gain for the teacher by this mental stocktaking was invaluable. The realisation that her work represented some actual achievement produced a sense of satisfaction, which completely restored her 'morale.' She became a keen experimenter; the range of her scope widened; her aims in teaching extended; her work improved surprisingly, while the effort which it entailed grew less.

It will be evident from this single example how important it is that the teacher should understand his own psychology. The limitations of the individual must be recognised, and the possibilities and the limitations of achievement within this personality must be estimated. Failure to do this may lead to disappointment, whereas recognition of these facts, on the contrary, often leads to surprising achievement. This process of reassessment must, moreover, be undertaken periodically if the teacher would remain conscious of the direction in which he is moving and would avoid the ever-present danger of his calling—'ruttiness.'

The aim and method of the teacher must vary for each individual. There can be no absolute right or wrong in the matter. Certain broad principles may furnish a basis of agreement for a larger or smaller majority, but the infinite variety of the human species makes it inevitable that the method of approach to these fundamentals must vary enormously. What we would urge is the necessity for individual stocktaking, undertaken in an unprejudiced spirit and followed by an honest effort on the part of the teacher towards a practical realisation of the results indicated by such cogitation.

Not only should the teacher know the 'whys and wherefores' of his drift in teaching—he should also analyse the proportionate elements in his musical faculty. He should test the acuteness of his pitch- and rhythmic-perception. He should ask himself whether he thinks most naturally along harmonic or melodic lines. He should test the functioning of his musical memory. Prof. Seashore, the doyen of American experimenters, in his analysis of musical reactions has produced available means for testing some of these capacities. The Columbia Graphophone Company has the monopoly of a series of records which serve as the medium for these tests. If we would investigate our musical memory, Gerald Cumberland's book 'Musical Memory' treats this subject in a practical manner. Finally—and this is most valuable of all—knowledge of musical reactions may be gained by informal discussion between fellow teachers. In this way those who depend largely on their rhythmic sense may compare their musical reactions with those whose response is chiefly tonal. Such knowledge, as the writer knows from personal experience, is invaluable in handling children of varying musical types.

If the real aim of teaching music is to make it a living entity to the child, the teacher must consider how he can best ensure that the constituent elements of music are apprehended by the child in some vital fashion. The number of persons who study music for several years, only to drop it entirely when they have the controlling of their own lives, proves conclusively that much musical education has failed in this respect in the past. It is evident that for such people music has never become an urgent necessity.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze, Dr. Yorke Trotter, Mr. Stewart Macpherson, Mr. Dolmetsch, and many others have made interesting contributions to this problem. American schools are testing theories experimentally, and reports of their results may be read in special numbers of the *New Era (January, 1927) and Progressive Education† (January, February, and March, 1927) devoted to music.

One of the most interesting of these experiments took place in the Lincoln School of Teachers College, under the direction of Mrs. Satis Coleman. Here an effort was made to correlate music with handwork. The children themselves made musical instruments, beginning when quite tiny with the simplest and most primitive, and working up to efforts as ambitious as a home-made 'cello! Not only did the children make the instruments, but they learnt to play them, too, and all kinds of interesting instrumental combinations resulted. The possibilities of ensemble work which this suggests, and the excellent practical aural training which it provides, are very strong arguments in support of the experiment.

It will be noted that in all these pioneer efforts emphasis is laid on creative musical activity within the power of the child. Teachers of instruments are often so pre-occupied with the technique of their craft that they forget that the intricacy of the medium in which they work makes musical spontaneity impossible. Insistence on individual performance as the hall-mark of musicianship is often a false standard.

It is, of course, extraordinarily easy to criticise destructively; any constructive suggestions are obviously open to a fusillade of objections. The writer will, in spite of this, dare to lay down one or two axioms which seem fundamentally important:

1. The teacher cannot force interest—he can only stimulate it once this interest has spontaneously generated.
2. The spontaneous generation of interest will lie along the lines of the child's normal interests.
3. At most the teacher can only place the child in situations favourable to the generation of this interest.
4. Knowledge based on genuine interest is assimilated with little apparent effort.

This suggests various interesting questions:

(b) What are his capacities at varying ages for perceiving and appreciating the component elements of music (rhythm, pitch, melody, harmony, &c.)?

The answers which we give to these questions will prove our quality as teachers; observation will show us whether our conclusions are correct or incorrect.

POINTS FROM LECTURES

'If you want a good choir, don't engage a solo organist.' That remark is set out in big headlines in the Leicester Mail. What Dr. Sydney Nicholson said in his lecture in that town was that 'congregations do not want solo organists; what they want is good choir-work. You may get a brilliant organist, but set him before half a dozen choir-boys and he is absolutely lost.' In another passage in his address, Dr. Nicholson said, 'Half our troubles in regard to Church music are due to the attitude of mind of those who think they are conferring a great blessing on the Almighty and on parsons by singing in Church choirs. It is a great honour for them to sing in these choirs, and the sooner they dismiss from their minds the impression that they should be patted on the back and told that they are good fellows, the better it will be for Church music.'

Prof. J. Lloyd Williams said many interesting and favourable things about the history of Welsh music during his lectures at Aberystwyth. He was critical, too. For nearly two hundred and fifty years there were absolutely no facilities for obtaining knowledge of music. A democracy mainly monoglot was left unassisted to grope for knowledge; but early last century text-books on harmony began to appear. With the turning out of a number of trained elementary school teachers, who had taken music in college, there was a rapid increase in the number of readers of music, most of those being Sol-faists. Town and village choirs all contributed towards an extension in the range of music sung. Still, real progress was slow. Turning to the future, Prof. Lloyd Williams said that evolution always worked on factors already present in the organism. The environmental factors could not in themselves make great musicians. They could supply the fertile soil. The lecturer concluded, 'I believe that the composer of genius will come; but in the first place he will have to be found born with the necessary hereditary powers. Secondly, his environment must be a favourable one; this the University now ensures. He should also be a thorough Welshman, who knows and understands the potentialities of his own language and who is thoroughly imbued with a love of its traditions and romance.'

The passing of Schubert was viewed in a rather fresh way by Mr. J. Gott, at Malvern: 'How different was this event from the honours paid to Beethoven, at whose funeral twenty thousand people were present; for Mendelssohn the shops and streets were draped in black; and Chopin's death was the most moving event in Paris in 1849.'

To portray 'The Charm of Vocal Music,' Dr. James E. Wallace, at Hull, described how in Elizabethan times evenings were spent in sitting round the fire, and it was a sign of culture to be able to take part in madrigals. These were extraordinarily difficult, and people sang them only because they wished to sing. There were no concerts, and singers did not aim at sweeping in an audience. They did not go blue in the face on top notes in those days, because it was not necessary. One of the great delights in taking part in old-time singing was to exploit the art of imitation—the same series of phrases repeated at different times. The best writers for voices of the present day were those who had intensively studied the part-writing of the 16th century.

Speaking of the general inability of the public to distinguish between the tones of the different wood-wind instruments, Mr. W. A. Chislett, at Halifax, said that in order to appreciate music to the full, it should be listened to with keen attention. If one woke up at three o'clock in the morning and heard a creak on the stairs, he really listened. If he listened as intently to music he would get much more out of it. To the speaker, it was a disappointment that many people did not get the best from orchestral music, because they had not a grasp of two or three elementary principles which, if explained to them, would increase their enjoyment a hundred-fold.

Sir Henry Coward has become prophetic in regard to jazz. 'Jazz is dying,' he said at Rotherham. 'Its leaders are now turning their attention to a sort of straightening out of the music as much as they can. Nine out of eleven jazz records I looked at yesterday had vocal refrains. Nearly all jazz records have vocal refrains nowadays, which shows that the jazz leaders have noticed that the music itself is losing its hold. By-and-by we shall see jazz take its place as a dead thing, but music will go on its way rejoicing.'

The Rev. A. Burns complained at a lecture at Rotherham, that up to quite recent years there had been no means of having music taught to children in the ordinary way. 'As a father I have had great rows with music teachers,' he said, 'when I have told them that I wanted my children to be instructed in music, and not merely to play the pianoforte. If I wanted that alone, I could buy a pianola. In days gone by the average music student got only a mechanical knowledge of certain notes, and was taught nothing of the phrase and rhythm of music.'

Humorous recollections by Dr. J. F. Staton were enjoyed by the Chesterfield Women's Club when he was their guest at a luncheon. He envied children their opportunities nowadays. 'My father could not afford to send me to a teacher of any note for my lessons, and as a matter of fact I was first taught by a bricklayer, who had no pianoforte. The lessons went something like this: "Now, boys, all together. We'll do common time, four in a bar. Down, right; left, oop! Doh on the ledger line, Ray in the space, Me on the first line, Fah in the first space." At an orchestral concert at Whittington Moor the trombonist found it very difficult to perform on the over-crowded platform. A kind old lady was sitting very close to him, deeply interested in his face, which was growing redder and redder with his exertions. Eventually she leaned forward, took hold of the trombone slide, and pulled it right out. "It 's all right," she explained. "Ah could see tha could never get it out thysen." The same trombone-player gave the unofficial conductor of the orchestra many troubled moments. He persisted in keeping to his own time, with disastrous results. Finally the conductor remonstrated, only to be met with the reply, "Get on wi' thee stick-wagging. Ah'll be wi' thee at finish."'

NOTES ON AN AMERICAN LECTURE TOUR

By Ernest Fowles

CHAMBER MUSIC

My first experience of American chamber music was at the Cleveland banquet *described in my first letter. During the evening, four boys from a neighbouring high school played a movement from a string quartet. I asked the chairman if these particular boys intended to take up the profession of music. (Incidentally, the question intimated my opinion of the quality of the ensemble playing.) The chairman's reply was a surprise. It was to the effect that quartet-playing was a feature of the high schools throughout the States, and that these particular boys were merely representative of the school music at Cleveland.

* See March number, p. 251.

All who have read my writings for many years past know how strenuously I have striven to develop the desire for the culture of what is in so great a sense music of the home, and they will enter into the feelings I then expressed of sympathy with so great a step forward in musical culture. For the statement was of course substantially accurate. Wherever I went, signs of quartet practice were in evidence.

ORCHESTRAL WORK

So much has been written about the orchestras of this great country that it is unnecessary to add to the amount of information already available. Besides, although I was present at a few symphony concerts, and can fully endorse the opinions expressed as to the value of the work being done by the well-established orchestras, my first sympathies were engaged by the school bands now being developed in every school, college, and University centre. Here, too, America is doing a gigantic and far-reaching work. While, owing to lack of time, I missed the Buffalo High School orchestra, I was able to spend some moments with the smaller one at Niagara Falls. Here is a growing orchestra of young enthusiasts with an equal enthusiast—to wit, Harold Spencer—at their head. Girls and boys vied with each other in showing me what they could do. The work they played was very creditably read at sight.

Another experience, though on a far larger scale, befel me at Detroit. As soon as I arrived, Arthur Searle, the head of the school music of that now enormous city, bethought himself that I would like to hear a thoroughly representative high school orchestra, and very kindly spent some hours in arranging for a special rehearsal. Owing to the shortness of time, it was impossible to judge the ultimate standard of the very large and complete modern orchestra revealed, but I heard enough to satisfy me that its potentialities were very great indeed. It was a privilege to address the young people with words of hearty encouragement.

Perhaps the most memorable impression was that connected with my first visit to the University of Ann Arbor. My own part in the proceedings of that happy day, my lectures to teachers and to the members of the University, is forgotten in the remembrance of watching Joe Maddy at work. With his enthusiastic and healthy outlook upon music it would be hard to imagine him other than he is—a bright, rejuvenating personality, who radiates music from his rostrum and infects his young disciples with an intense desire to excel. He passed to me several scores, and asked me to select any work for rehearsal. My choice fell on the Overture to 'The Mastersingers.' It appeared that months had elapsed since they had worked at it. Nevertheless, I am bound to say that the players gave a very good account of themselves. Moreover, the work was played with evident enjoyment on the part of each member—in the circumstances a very significant fact. All honour to Joe Maddy and his orchestra—or orchestras, for it appears that he has many.

In reviewing all I saw and heard, I am led to wonder whether America is not developing too quickly—in musical culture, at any rate; whether, in fact, her teachers will rise to the occasion—in the next generation that is, when they will most be wanted. They are struggling bravely to meet the present need, but will the numbers of adequately trained teachers be sufficient to compass the work of a few years hence, when the present development of orchestral knowledge and technique has filled the land with an innumerable body of music-lovers who at any rate will know the difference between music well taught and music ill taught? That will be an enormous problem, even for America.

AMERICAN MUSIC TEACHERS

On the whole, the teacher gatherings were among my greatest inspirations. As in my own country, musical development mainly depends upon the teachers, and particularly upon those engaged in elementary work. It was my exceeding good fortune to address a number of such gatherings. That at Boston will always be memorable. The day was damp, bitterly cold, with a wind which searched one through and through. Yet the teachers turned up in full force for a two-hours' talk which, I am afraid, lengthened almost into three! I am no novice in addressing teachers; in fact, it is a matter of pride to hold it as my own very particular job; but I have never before had audiences quite like these. They hung upon one's words and, by their attitude and demeanour, showed that they were out to catch at least an echo of the latest thought upon musical education.

Another memorable gathering was that at Chicago, at the National Conservatory of Music. I spoke upon the need for a threefold educative course in music, and emphasised the national importance of a fluent reading of notation—a matter equally pressing in America as well as in Great Britain.

These gatherings, as well as others at New York, Detroit, New Rochelle, and elsewhere, gave me the opportunity, for which I had often longed, to measure the musical capacity of the individual teachers of America. Until, perchance, my next visit to the States, I can say but little on the score of purely technical equipment, but it is scarcely possible to exaggerate the comradely spirit of the teachers as a whole. This is, after all, the spirit which leads to the really great things of education. It indicates fellowship as between teacher and teacher. It represents the negation of isolatedness, always the barrier to progress and the begetter of pettiness and narrowness. It is, in brief, the teacher's most precious asset; for, by its insistence upon intercourse with brethren of the same cloth and with the same needs, it promotes knowledge leading to experience, and ultimately to idealism.

America, then, seems also to be solving this problem. It is impossible to exclude what may be an unwelcome comparison. Have our teachers, as a body, attained to the spirit of fellowship reached by their cousins across the Atlantic? Many British teachers, I know, flock to summer schools and the various lectures given from time to time upon the teacher's craft; but the very large majority of music teachers in this country are wholly unaffected by these movements. What can be done to arouse them? The way has been found by our American brethren. Can we not find it, too? If the average teacher knew the magnitude of the loss involved in abstention from the means of personal development, the problem would very quickly be solved. The tragedy is that he does not know!

An Easter Vacation Course will be held at the Training School for Music Teachers, 73, High Street, Marylebone, W.1, from April 2-6. The course will have for its central idea 'The Equipment of the Modern Music Teacher,' and a notable team of lecturers will be present. Full particulars from the Secretary, Mr. Edgar B. Wilson, 58, Fairlop Road, E.11.

The ninth annual Musicians' Holiday and Vacation Course for Music Teachers, which has been held for some years at Seascale, is moving south this year, and will take place at Eastbourne from August 1-29. Details and booking forms from the Secretary, Training School for Music Teachers, 73, High Street, Marylebone, W.1.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. Our 'Answers to Correspondents' Column closes on the 14th of the month. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

E. P.—(1.) Evidently we were misinformed. Clearly the pamphlet you quote shows that residence is necessary in order to take the musical degree. (2.) You do not say whether you are working with a teacher. If so, and if he knows his job, you should leave the matter to him. If, however, you are working by yourself, we can only suggest that you hear as much orchestral music as possible, following the music with the score; and that you do heaps of scoring yourself, so as to acquire experience and facility.

E. F. G.—(1.) An enharmonic modulation is one in which a change of key is made by taking a chord in one key and leaving it in another. For example, in this progression:

the third chord in (a) is a dominant seventh in F; in (b) it is again taken as dominant seventh in F, but quitted as an augmented sixth on C, modulating to E minor. The enharmonic change is shown by the bracketed note and figure, but such indications are not used save in text-book illustrations, or occasionally (for the convenience of the singers) in choral music. (2.) The voice between a contralto and a mezzo-soprano is known as mezzo-contralto. When you say that 'some contraltos sing like a soprano, some like a bass,' you are evidently thinking of the extreme notes. The lower ones often have a masculine quality (of which the possessor unwisely makes as much as possible), and the high ones are practically the same as those of a mezzo-soprano. Your other questions we do not understand: 'To what class of modulation does recitative belong?' and 'It is stated by theorists that older composers, such as Bach and even Beethoven, abused the use of the slur. Why is this? Surely they knew what the slur meant.' Surely; but what do those 'theorists' mean? Find out, and ask us again.

J. B.—(1.) There is, we believe, more work of the kind you mention to be had in the United States or S. Africa than in England or Ireland, but only well-qualified men are likely to stand much of a chance. (2.) We think your age is somewhat of a handicap. It is rather late in the day to take up music professionally, especially in the matter of conducting—a department in which many brilliant young men are knocking at the door. As for composing, it is a delightful hobby, but not a reliable means of livelihood. (3.) We are unable to advise you concerning study abroad, or as to what line of study to adopt. As you say you are prepared to work for three years, we think you could hardly do better than enter the Royal Academy of Music or the Royal College of Music. Before your three years have expired you will probably be able to see what your next move should be.

F. K. T. (New Zealand).—Our view is that Henry Smart wrote some excellent organ music, which deserves more attention than it gets to-day. It is always wholesome, well suited to the instrument, and thoroughly well written. We fancy that at some future date his best work will be 'discovered' with pleased surprise. We know too little about his choral music to justify an opinion. Thanks for your words of appreciation of the Musical Times. We are glad that after twenty-two years of subscribership 'in various disagreeable parts of the world' you still find the old journal 'extraordinarily readable.'

Tyddyn Dafydd.—The difference between a folk-song and a national air is slight, but definite. For instance, 'Rule, Britannia,' is a national song, but not a folk-song. Generally speaking, the term 'folk-song' is not applied to songs of which the composer is known. Logically, the case may be put thus: A folk-song is always a national song, but a national song is not necessarily a folk-song. We do not know the Brinley Richards volume of Welsh National Airs. (By the way, his 'God bless the Prince of Wales' may be said to have established itself as a national song.)

Lucy.—We do not know the Schubert album to which you refer, so we cannot explain the apparently unnecessary use of the sharp. On the face of it, it appears to be either a printer's error or a fad of the editor's.

F. E. H.—For good voluntaries we suggest the short pieces of Rheinberger: Twelve Monologues, Twelve Characteristic Pieces, Twelve Meditations, Ten Trios, and Six Short Pieces. All these may be had from Novello's, and the Monologues and Characteristic Pieces may be had in volume form. Some of these pieces are not easy, but few are very difficult. Add to these the more straightforward among Bach's Chorale Preludes. Most of the material we suggest is rather more difficult than the set of Novello's 'Short Preludes,' but you will have trouble in finding organ music of that character and quality which is also easy.

E. J. D.—We have replied to several correspondents recently concerning music for organ and pianoforte. If you can obtain the help of a good pianist, try such of the classical concertos as are published with the orchestral part arranged for a second pianoforte. This can easily be adapted to the organ, generally with excellent effect. If you want something smaller and less difficult, write to Messrs. Novello for a list of their publications for pianoforte and harmonium.

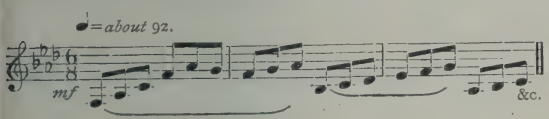
Organist, and E. C. H.—No book deals specially with the history of English music from 1550-60. Henry Davey's 'History of English Music' (Curwen, 25*s.*) covers this period in chap. iv. And you should also dig out and collate information from the biographies of the composers of that time. See 'Grove,' and Pulver's 'Biographical Dictionary of Old English Music' (Kegan Paul, 25*s.*).

Olivia.—(1.) The Saint-Saëns work referred to is 'Le Carnaval des Animaux'—a series of humorous pieces written for private performance and withheld from publication by the composer. The work has appeared since his death. An arrangement for pianoforte duet may be had. (2.) We don't know the origin of the Grainger title, 'Molly on the Shore.'

D. T.—Questions of the kind you send must be accompanied by a copy of the passage referred to. We don't keep stacks of examination pieces at our elbow, and even if we did, we couldn't spare time to hunt up the references. Copy out the little bit that bothers you, and write again. If the matter is urgent, we will reply at once by post.

H. M. B.—Stick to your guns, and insist on the passage being sung as the composer wrote it. The dragged-out version your parson and people like has simply developed from persistent overdoing of the rallentando which so many organists and choirs regard as being necessary at every verse-end.

E. W. B.—We cannot recall an organ piece beginning with this theme, quoted from memory and key guessed:



Can a reader help 'E. W. B.'?

C. B. H.—It is impossible to give an opinion on your Handel volume without seeing it. A letter to Mr. C. W. Smith, at the British Museum, will probably bring you the information.

A. B. E.—(1.) We know neither of the instruction books you name. (2.) Advertisements of the College you mention do not appear in the Musical Times. Why? Because we refuse to insert them.

H. W.—C. Kennedy Scott's 'Madrigal Singing' (2*s.* 6*d.*) is the best guide we know. It may be had through Novello's.

Several readers kindly tell us that the song about which 'Musicus' inquired last month is 'The Harvester's Night Song,' by Baynton Power.

Mr. Stanley Chapple is announced to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, at Berlin, on April 3, when he will give the first Berlin performance of Goossens's Sinfonietta. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings will also be in the programme. The Symphony will be Brahms's No. 3.

Church and Organ Music

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

CHOIR-TRAINING EXAMINATION

The Choir-training Diploma and Certificate Examinations will both be held at the College on Wednesday and Thursday, May 15 and 16. Last day of entry, Monday, April 22.

On February 16, at the Royal College of Organists, Sir Hamilton Harty gave a lecture on Brahms's Variations for Orchestra on a Theme by Haydn, Op. 56*a*, which has been set for analysis at the July Fellowship examination. A report of the lecture will appear in the College Calendar.

Mr. Reginald Steggall, Lincoln's Inn, has been elected a member of the Council.

H. A. Harding

THE SCHOOL OF ENGLISH CHURCH MUSIC

Work was commenced at the College of St. Nicolas, Chislehurst, on January 16, when the Bishop of Truro dedicated the various gifts to the Chapel. The organ has now been installed, and regular services have been held daily since the opening day. The present students have been housed in temporary accommodation, but the Students' Hostel is now approaching completion and will be ready for next term. This will commence on April 19, and there will be space for about fourteen new students. Particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, S.E.C.M., College of St. Nicolas, Elmstead Lane, Chislehurst, Kent. During this first term several inquiries have been received from clergy and others in need of choirmasters and organists; some of these posts have been filled through the efforts of the School. While it has not been possible to find suitable candidates in several cases, the number and character of the inquiries furnish welcome evidence that the kind of training which the College provides is that which is sought for by those who have appointments to offer.

The Rochester Choral Society and the Maidstone Choral Union (conductor, Mr. F. Wilson Parish) combined on February 28 at Rochester Cathedral, singing Bach's double-choir Motet 'Sing ye to the Lord,' Parry's Coronation Anthem and 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Thee, Lord, before the close of day,' and E. T. Chapman's 'All creatures of our God and King.' Mr. C. Hylton Stewart conducted a fine performance, and also played organ solos; Mr. Percy Whitlock accompanied; and Miss Christine McClure sang songs by Bach, Bairstow, &c. The combined choirs numbered about two hundred and fifty voices.

English friends of the late Dr. Lawrence Walker, of Belfast, should note that a fund has been started for the erection of a memorial in St. James's Church, Belfast, where he officiated as organist and choirmaster for forty years. Dr. Walker did notable work in Northern Ireland on behalf of music and musicians, and we commend the fund to our readers. The hon. secretaries and treasurers are the Rev. E. C. Dixon, 362, Antrim Road, Belfast, and Mr. H. A. Newel, Taunton Avenue, Belfast.

The German Church at Manchester was packed on February 24 for a concert arranged by Mr. Carl Fuchs. The performers were past and present members of the string ensemble class held by Mr. Fuchs in association with Mr. H. A. Robinson. The programme comprised string solos by Bach, Schubert, Martini, and Brahms; the Adagio from Haydn's Quartet, Op. 76, No. 5; and Beethoven's 'Harp' Quartet. Mr. Robinson accompanied, and played organ solos by Bach and Reger.

At Newcastle Cathedral, on February 16, the Newcastle Bach Choir added four Bach Cantatas to the long list it has performed—No. 17, 'Who thanks offers, he praiseth Me'; No. 35, 'Soul and Spirit'; No. 168, 'Come to judgment'; and No. 31, 'The Heavens laugh.' Report says that the choir sang admirably. In the absence, through illness, of Mr. William Ellis, Mr. Tustin Baker deputised at the organ at short notice, with excellent results. The soloists were Miss Ethel Durrant, Madame Rosa Burn, Mr. Thomas Danskin, and Mr. A. L. Lewis. Mr. Alfred Wall led the orchestra, and Dr. Whittaker conducted.

The organ at Bangor Cathedral has been rebuilt and enlarged by Messrs. Hill & Son and Norman & Beard, and is now a four-manual with sixty-four speaking stops, twenty-one couplers, and forty-two pistons. The opening ceremony took place on March 15, when Dr. A. W. Wilson gave a recital, his programme including three Handel pieces, Bach's 'St. Anne' Fugue, Parry's Preludes on 'St. Cross' and 'Hanover,' &c.

The work of restoring and electrifying the famous Willis organ at the Alexandra Palace, Muswell Hill, London, is to begin at last. This instrument is not only one of the largest, but probably the finest organ ever constructed by 'Father' Willis. Its long association with the names of Frederick Archer and G. D. Cunningham lends further interest to the enterprise.

Mr. W. A. Roberts recently gave a recital at St. Peter's, Oldham, before the local Organists' Association, with a programme drawn from the works of composers associated with Liverpool—W. T. Best, A. L. Peace, William Faulkes, A. W. Pollitt, James Lyon, and H. F. Ellingford. A good idea.

A Wagner and Elgar programme was performed at the hundred and fifty-ninth Anthem and Organ Recital at Brighton Parish Church on February 26. The choir sang a 'Parsifal' selection, and Elgar's forty-eighth Psalm, 'Great is the Lord,' and Dr. Chastey Hector played Elgar's Organ Sonata.

At St. Giles's Church, Reading, four hundred singers took part in the United Choirs Festival organized by the Berkshire Organists' Association. Mr. P. R. Scrivener conducted, and the singing reached a high level. Various local organists did duty as soloists and accompanists.

'Elijah' was sung at Fabian's Bay Congregational Church, Swansea, on February 21, by the Church choir, conducted by Mr. Richard Leyshon. The soloists were Miss Annie Davies, Madame Davies Howells, Mr. Emlyn Burns, and Mr. Hugh Phelps.

The programme for the musical performance at Southwark Cathedral on April 6, at 3 p.m., will consist of Purcell's Te Deum, Holst's Two Psalms, Handel's fourth Organ Concerto, Casella's Suite Romano for organ and strings, and Easter Carols.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have re-built the organ of the Dutch Reformed Church, Paarl, South Africa. The instrument is now a three-manual of thirty-three speaking stops and twenty-five pistons.

RECITALS

Mr. Fred Gostelow, St. Michael's, Sittingbourne—Overture, 'Egmont,' Beethoven; Fugue in D, Bach; Choral No. 3, Franck; 'Elfes,' Bonnet.

Mr. W. Stamp, St. Andrew-by-the-Wardrobe, E.C.—Concerto in G minor, Handel; Four Hymn-tune Studies, Charlton Palmer; Choral Improvisation on 'Werde münter, mein Gemute,' Karg-Elert.

Letters to the Editor

SCHUBERTIANA

SIR,—Most writers on Schubert treat 'Erlkönig' as a proper name, though it definitely means 'Alderking.' That Herder, from whose translation of a Danish ballad Goethe took the word, mistranslated the Danish 'Ellekonge,' and was not merely giving a transcription of it, is proved by the crucial fact that Danish 'elle' does in other contexts mean 'alder.' This was evidently unknown to Viehoff (Goethe's Gedichte), and apparently to Mr. Capell, who speaks of 'the Danish elf-king somehow becoming . . . a warlock of the alders.' Herder's blunder was the more natural in that 'Eller' is also a German synonym for 'Erle.' Goethe might in any case be supposed to mean the same as Herder, but his intentions are put beyond doubt by (a) his use of the inflected form 'Erlenkönig'; (b) his repeated reference to trees; (c) the fact that the ballad was originally incidental to a Singspiel, 'Die Fischerin,' and the stage directions for the scene in which it was sung were: 'By the river beneath tall alders stand fishermen's huts,' &c. (Viehoff). Mr. Capell's remark that 'the alder's twigs have for us no grisly fingers' does not seem helpful, for on any interpretation of the poem its effectiveness must surely depend on the baselessness of the child's fears. Bielschowsky gives reasons for regarding 'the sick child' as symbolic of the weak soul that succumbs to evils of its own creation.

Another significant name commonly treated as proper is 'Convict.' It and its unshortened equivalent 'Convictorium' mean 'boarding-school,' and apparently differ from 'Alumnat,' 'Internat,' &c., only in being Roman Catholic, and more especially Jesuit, terms.* Schubert's Convict was a Jesuit foundation, and was re-established, not 'established,' as Mr. Capell says, in 1802 (v. Flower, p. 19). Explanation of this word seems doubly desirable because of the misleading English homonym, the one deriving from Latin vinco, the other from vivo. According to the N.E.D., the form 'convictor' was academic Latin for 'boarder,' 'commoner,' and is, or was, used as an English word in Roman Catholic seminaries.

Finally, Schubert's 'Serenade' now so immediately suggests the Rellstab one that Mr. Flower might emphasise more than he does that the Grillparzer one, so prominent in his book, is a totally different work; in his index the two are definitely confused. That Schubert was so much affected on hearing the Grillparzer one performed, and that he chose it for his only concert, suggest that it is unduly neglected. For some reason the Opus number is given as 134 by Mr. Flower, but as 135 in the British Museum catalogue.—Yours, &c.,

ORGAN PEDALLING

SIR,—I was very much interested in the article by 'Feste' in last month's Musical Times on 'Organ Pedalling, Past and Present,' and, if I may be allowed, I should like to have a little to say on the subject.

In the first place, 'Feste' says he doesn't know if the old toe method of teaching is still in vogue. I can say without any doubt that it is; just recently I can think of several new pupils who have been amazed when shown the possibilities of sliding, oblique footing, and alternate toe and heel used in conjunction with alternate feet, &c.

Now with regard to Ex. 1 from the Ellingford-Meers book (which I have not seen, by the way). I entirely, agree with the footing given by 'Feste' in Ex. 3. Ex. 2 is unnatural and most awkward, unless, of course, the vocation of organist is confined to those born with double ankle-joints!

Of the three ways of pedalling this passage, two are equally possible:

(N.B.—'R'=Rear position—many students get confused as to which foot to put in front or behind.)

The pedalling given in (b) was shown to me by a pupil of Edwin Lemare, and I believe that in effect it has greater clearness and precision than that of (a), especially when the fugue is taken at a good pace. With regard to Ex. 6, there seems to be a misprint (the E in third beat); otherwise 'Feste's' pedalling is by far the easier and again most natural.

Oblique footing.—There are undoubtedly great possibilities in this. Much crossing of feet can be avoided, and I go so far as to say that it is possible to execute any interval up to an octave in a true legato manner. This was proved to me by my teacher, M. Paul de Maleingreau, at Brussels. (I should have added that this is providing the interval does not cross too far over the middle section of the pedal-board. 'Feste' says, 'Using the heel and toe as a bridge,' but is there not also a certain glissando movement, too?)

In conclusion, I am led to believe that there is much for us to know yet about organ-playing; in his short article on one department only, 'Feste' has raised many points. A month or two ago I made a few notes which may interest your readers. I give them for what they are worth:

1. Tendencies of modern organ-playing: where are they leading us?
2. How many organists ever realise to the full the first principle of organ-playing, i.e., part-playing?
3. The lack of knowledge of the general public and even many musicians concerning the organ, and how this tends to keep the standard down.
4. How listeners can be duped and how players can be satisfied with their own performances is amazing.
5. How the art of modern organ-playing compares with that of modern pianoforte-playing.
6. Hundreds of people still think of the organ as an instrument on which to play hymns and slow music (perhaps this is altered by the cinema 'organs').
7. Varieties of touch-manual and pedal. Have they been sufficiently explored and explained?

—Yours, &c.,

R. A. JEVONS.

SIR,—I have read with interest 'Feste's' review of 'The Science of Organ-Pedalling' (Ellingford and Meers). Quite twenty-seven years ago my father made me study two volumes of 'Pedal Exercises' by Horner (published by Novello), in which the heels were freely used, and the smoothness and ease given to the pedal technique by such a system utterly ruled out for ever the old stiff toe-toe-toe method. Difficult passages in Bach, Rheinberger, Mendelssohn, &c., not only become easier and less fatiguing to play, by reason of the far smaller number of movements made by each leg; they also gain musically because the feet and ankles are used in a much more human and less wooden way, so that the touch and phrasing can be treated almost as though by the hands on the manuals.

Even Stainer's first two pages of pedal exercises, when read as consisting of two voices, one to be played

CENTENARY CELEBRATIONS

Sir,—A music critic recently lamented the shortage of coming birthday and death-day centenaries of great musicians, and stated that after the death centenaries of Weber in 1926, Beethoven in 1927, and Schubert in 1928, we shall actually have to wait until the years 1947 and 1956, when the death centenaries of Mendelssohn and Schumann will be commemorated.

That is, of course, absurd, for one need go only as far as the next decade, during which the birth and death centenaries of the following famous and illustrious musicians will occur: Anton Rubinstein (centenary of birth in 1929), Hans von Bülow (centenary of birth in 1930), Joseph Joachim (centenary of birth in 1931), Joseph Haydn (bi-centenary of birth in 1932), Muzio Clementi (centenary of death in 1932), Johannes Brahms (centenary of birth in 1933), François Adrien Boieldieu (centenary of death in 1934), Camille Saint-Saëns (centenary of birth in 1935), Johann Nepomuk Hummel (centenary of death in 1937), Max Bruch (centenary of birth in 1938), Georges Bizet (centenary of birth in 1938), and Joseph Rheinberger (centenary of birth in 1939).—Yours, &c.,

Algernon Ashton.

'THE LARYNX AGAIN'

Sir,—I cannot agree with some of the statements made by Mr. Travers Adams and Mr. Herbert Cæsari. The vocal cords are not directly under the control of the will, and therefore any supposed concentration upon their action is certainly useless and probably harmful. The following quotation from Sir Frederick Mott's 'The Brain and the Voice in Speech and Song' should make this clear:

> 'When we desire to produce a particular vocal sound, a mental perception of the sound, which is almost instinctive in a person with a musical ear, awakens by association motor centres in the brain that preside over the innervation currents necessary for the approximation and minute alterations in the tensions of the vocal cords requisite for the production of a particular note. We are not conscious of any kinæsthetic [sense of movement] guiding sensations from the laryngeal muscles, but we are of the muscles of the tongue, lips, and jaw in the production of articulate sounds. It is remarkable that there are hardly any sensory nerve-endings in the vocal cords and muscles of the larynx, consequently it is not surprising to find that the ear is the guiding sense for correct modulation of the loudness and pitch of the speaking as well as the singing voice.'

By all means let us concentrate upon a correct method of breathing, upon a free formation of the vowel sounds, upon sensations connected with vocal resonance, and, above all, upon that training of the inner ear of the singer, which is his chief guide, and leave the vocal cords to that unconscious region to which they belong. The singers in Handel's day seemed to have managed very well—even without the laryngoscope to enlighten them regarding the action of their vocal cords.—Yours, &c.,

Dawson Freer.

MUSIC AND THE CINEMA

Sir,—During a broadcast talk on February 27, Mr. Edwin Evans expressed the opinion that 'to see a film without music is a most depressing experience.' He said, further, that 'few people are actively conscious of the music during a film.' Is it not equally justifiable to say that music is an actual advantage to only one film in a hundred, and in nearly every other case it is an irritant to any member of the audience who is at all musically inclined? Why should a comedy or a good story on the films require music at all? It is just as sensible to argue that one should not read Dumas's book 'The Three Musketeers' without at the same time having lively music provided by gramophone.

The first aim of most films is to tell a story, and in the telling of a story music cannot be considered 'a vital factor.' Mr. Evans says the film 'is not self-sufficient as a visual art,' which is an extremely disputable statement to make ever since Chaplin produced 'The Woman of Paris.' A few films have been produced with music carefully fitted to them in which sound helps sight, but with the great majority of pictures music has no more to do than it has with food. Music in both cinema and restaurant is far more often an annoyance than a pleasure, regardless of what is played, and even if the question of its quality is carefully considered, few musicians would deny the truth of this statement. Good music needs undivided attention. Any other kind deserves none.—Yours, &c.,

Leeds. 'Tyke.'

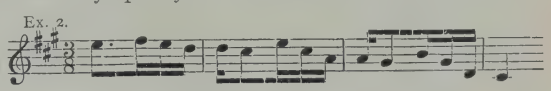
SCHUMANN'S FIRST SYMPHONY

Sir,—In listening to a performance the other night from Liverpool of Schumann's first Symphony in D minor, I was struck by the similarity of a theme in the last movement, which is:

Ex. 1.

with a theme in the slow movement of Beethoven's second Symphony:

Ex. 2.



I wonder if many listeners noticed this? It would have been characteristic of Sir George Grove to mention it in his book on Beethoven's Symphonies, but, curiously, the resemblance of the two tunes does not seem to have occurred to him.

The performance recently, under Pierre Monteux, was a superb one, and I rejoice that Schumann's Symphonies are slowly but surely coming into their own in this country. A few more performances such as we have had lately should convince the most hardened opponent of Schumann's orchestration how fine his works can be made to sound in the hands of a great conductor.—Yours, &c.,

WHAT DID Mr. GREWGIOUS HEAR?

Sir,—I wonder if any of your numerous readers can suggest a hymn, anthem, or chant which would settle one of the smaller (musical) mysteries of the great unsolved problem of 'The Mystery of Edwin Drood'? When Mr. Grewgious is waiting in the cathedral for the service to end, so that he can see Mr. Jasper, he listens to part of it (described below). The piece should have been published earlier than 1850, and be suitable for a cathedral. If a hymn, it should, of course, be in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.'* Personally I am inclined to the opinion that it ought not to be a hymn, for generally the tune is played over before the singing, and there is no mention of such. The last piece of music I take to be a Voluntary or Recessional. The choral piece should, from the context, be one in which the words 'living waters' occur. Two hymns have been suggested: 'I heard the voice of Jesus say' and 'The King of Love my shepherd is.' I am told the second is sometimes used as an anthem. But the tunes, as found in 'Ancient and Modern,' do not seem to suit the description Dickens gives, as follows:

* 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' did not appear until 1860.—Editor.

The Reader.—'One feeble voice rising and falling in a cracked monotonous mutter, could at intervals be faintly heard. . . .' The 'cracked monotonous mutter went on like a dying voice until—

First Piece.—'. . . . the organ and choir burst forth and drowned it [the voice] in a sea of music. Then, the sea fell . . .'

The Reader.—'. . . . the sea rose high, and beat its [the voice's] life out, and lashed the roof, and surged among the arches, and pierced the heights of the great tower, and then the sea was dry and all was still.'

Mr. Grewgious 'met the living waters coming out' (chap. ix.).—Yours, &c., DICKENSIAN.

THE DATE OF BYRD'S MASSES

SIR,—With reference to the recently published volume of Byrd's Masses and 'Cantiones Sacræ' (Tudor Church Music, vol. 9), will you kindly allow me to point out that the editors have inadvertently misquoted me in their Introduction, p. 11. It is the earlier publications of Byrd, those of 1575, 1588, 1589, and 1591, which exhibit invariably the time-signature C, while the later ones, those of 1605, 1607, and 1611, have the unbarred semi-circle C; and not vice-versa.

From this I inferred that the five-part Mass belonged to the earlier period, and the other two Masses to the later ('Proceedings of the Musical Association,' thirty-ninth session, p. 71). The same mistake occurs in Dr. Fellowes's 'William Byrd,' p. 32, published by the Oxford University Press. As I have already been asked for an explanation of this apparently fallacious reasoning, perhaps you will allow me to clear up the matter once and for all.—Yours, &c.,

Birmingham. H. B. COLLINS.

HAYDN'S DIVERTIMENTO IN B FLAT

SIR,—In your review in the March issue, of my book upon 'Musical Instruments, 1500-1750,' you quote a passage about Haydn's Divertimento in B flat. You deduce, presumably from my words, that the present owner of the manuscript of this work has obstructed both publication and performance.

I should like to make it as clear as possible that I had no such meaning, and even now I cannot read it into my words.

This manuscript was for many years in the possession of Auguste Tolbecque, the famous French 'cellist and authority upon stringed instruments. Towards the end of his long life he gave it to the present owner, who has had it for, perhaps, thirty years. I do not know about previous performances, but it was certainly played, with every possible care and respect, at the first of the Haslemere Festivals (1925). The full history of the manuscript was publicly given from the platform, and the performance was well reported in the press. If neither editors nor publishers were moved to follow up the lead thus given, the fault must not be laid upon the owner of the manuscript, who, as far as I know, has never expressed any objection to publicity.

May I suggest that the logical sequel to your review is for the Musical Times to endeavour to publish this work?—Yours, &c., GERALD R. HAYES.

37, Clanricarde Gardens, W.2.

[A re-reading of the passage in Mr. Hayes's book still seems to us to imply that Haydn's Divertimento is jealously kept in private hands in order that it might not be 'distorted' by the substitution of a 'cello for a viola da gamba—dreadful fate! We are glad to find that Mr. Hayes didn't mean what we thought he meant. The Musical Times doesn't publish chamber music, but, being enthusiastic about Haydn, we will certainly do what we can to bring about publication of the Divertimento.—EDITOR.]

'SCIENTISTS AND MUSICIANS'

SIR,—I have been a regular reader for some years, but this is the first time I have written to you. I do so to congratulate you on Catherine E. Eggar's article on 'Scientists and Musicians.' I have also been an enthusiastic reader of J. W. N. Sullivan's popular science writings for many years. I bought his book on Beethoven as soon as it appeared. In my opinion it stands alone in that no other brain like Sullivan's is doing such criticism. It was good to see your contributor's appreciation of it also.

As the editor of the chief musical monthly in England, could you not ask Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Einstein to write for you? They may be expensive. (I don't know, but doubt it, as they are not professional musicians. You will remember Adam Smith's dictum on the price of work done as a hobby!) But even if you reduced the number of pages—by slaughtering some of the local reports in order to pay these men—I would willingly buy the Musical Times at twice the price. I feel sure there are thousands like me who would welcome such articles as something new and sound in criticism—not mere juggling with technical points.

Not one of the regular musical critics has Sullivan's outlook and, with all respect to professional musicians—I have a few very good friends amongst them—he values and sees music more truly in relation to life than most of them. Mr. Fox-Strangways tries to tie it up with life also. The work is not easy, with all his scholarship. On the other hand, Mr. Capell discusses music just as music, and equally delights one. (I've written a little myself, and always read all the serious musical criticism that comes my way.)

I welcome Miss Eggar's suggestion that science should measure the nervous effect of different compositions, just as it has proved that noise tires.—Yours, &c., J. A. H.

A letter from Mr. John F. Russell, replying to 'H. C.'s' criticism of the Hallé Society, arrived too late for insertion. It will appear in our next number.

Competition Festival Record

BELFAST (February 13-23).—This year's competitions are considered to have been the most successful that have been held here. It is reckoned that out of over every thousand in the population of Ulster, four people took an active part in them. The first three days were occupied with elocution, including the final scene from 'The Blue Bird' as a dramatic test for children. The children's choral singing on the first Saturday was satisfactory, but slightly lower than it should have been in standard and in pitch. Among the adult soloists of the second week Miss Eileen White, a contralto, won the Rose Bowl, Mr. Joseph Gordon, baritone, won the Ulster challenge cup for all soloists, and Miss Mary Spencer-Smith, soprano, distinguished herself, as also did the three ladies from Larne College of Music with their combined singing of Weelkes and Morley. Mixed-voice choirs in the open class sang Elgar's 'The Shower' and Cavendish's 'Come, gentle swains.' The first place was taken by St. Paul's Choral Society (Mr. C. D. Kinnis), and the second place was shared by Derry Glee and Madrigal Society (Mr. J. T. Frankland), and Castleton (Mr. H. K. Collins). Derry (Mr. Frankland) sent the best female-voice choir. In the open male-voice choir class Victoria (Mr. J. Shirra) was first and Alpha (Mr. George Eacott) a mark behind. Prizes were also won by Royal Belfast Academic Institution (Mr. Geoffrey Garrod) and by Antrim Girls' Friendly Society. There were very few Church choirs. A set of dances from 'The Fairy Queen' were played by the string orchestras. The prize went to the Methodist College Orchestra (Mr. E. A. A. Stonley), which has been the winner since 1924. Belfast Co-operative Orchestra (Mr. R. Orton), which was second in this competition, was first in that for full orchestras.

Cambuslang.—The eighth Cambuslang Festival, situated in a depressed industrial area, suffered contraction both in entries and in public support, competition extending to nineteen sessions as against twenty-six last year. Principal awards: Mixed Choirs—Challenge, Wishaw and District; Small, Caldercruix Musical Association. Women's Choirs—Challenge, Clydebank U.F. Church; Small, Trinity U.F. Church, Renfrew. Church Choirs—Challenge, Parkhead U.F. Church, Glasgow; Small, St. Thomas Wesleyan, Glasgow; Junior, Oatlands U.F. Church, Glasgow. Junior Choirs—Gilbertfield Co-operative. School Choirs—Larkhall Academy. Vocal Solos—General, William G. Noble, Glasgow; Scots Song, James M. Todd, Rutherglen. Pianoforte—Diploma, Jack Whitefield, Cambuslang.

Carlisle (March 4-7).—This Festival appeals to rural choirs over a widening area, and each year increases its influence. One of the most popular and characteristic events was the singing of the 18th-century hunting song, 'Old Towler,' by dalesmen from Pattersdale, especially as this, the winning, choir was conducted by a woman (Dr. Enid Birch). Haltwhistle Vocal Union was the best of twenty-two female-voice choirs, Keswick the best male-voice choir. In the open challenge shield class, for mixed-voice choirs, the first three in order were Stanwix, Carlisle, and Haltwhistle. In other classes, choirs from Hudson Scott's won three first prizes.

Chatham (February 2, 9, 13, 16, and 23).—This Festival appeals not only to the 'Medway Towns' which give it a title, but to a large area of London suburbs. Many choirs, juvenile and adult, come in to compete, and with a good following in solo and various instrumental classes, it has become a flourishing meeting-ground for musicians. In the chief choral classes the leading choirs were Chatham Co-operative Senior Choir (Mr. A. V. Stannard), Mr. Leslie Mackay's Choir, Chatham (female-voice), and Rochester and District Women's Institute (Miss G. Blower). The Medway Sextets sang excellently against each other in 'This sweet and merry month.' Miss Dorothy M. Saywell, of Rainham, won in a conductors' class. There was quite a school of chamber-music players headed by groups of players from Gillingham and Chatham. Orchestral playing was also well supported, the prizes being won by Rochester Junior Technical School (Miss M. Baker) and Medway Symphony Orchestra (Mr. W. Petchey).

Chelsea (March 7-9).—The first Festival in this highly musical quarter met with ready support, and will no doubt quickly set up more numerous rivalries. On this occasion the Chelsea Madrigal Club and Madame Henriette Schmidt's orchestral players had matters in their own hands. The former took the prizes for mixed-voice and male-voice singing, and the latter helped themselves in the string orchestra, string quartet, pianoforte trio, and pianoforte and violin duet classes. This last was the nearest approach to a solo class that the Festival permitted itself, its object being to promote concerted performance of all kinds. A combined concert, with the Mayors of Chelsea and Westminster presiding in perfect amity, ended the proceedings.

Devon.—These competitions were held, as usual, at three centres. At Barnstaple (February 27-28) the best work was done by the school choirs, especially that of High Bickington. Barnstaple United Methodist Choir did well, but without opposition, in the female-voice class. At Tavistock (March 1-2), both juvenile and adult choirs showed a high level of competence in singing at sight. Buckland Monachorum, a musical village, sent capable choirs and the winning orchestra (ninety marks). The busiest centre was Exeter, where competitions were held on March 1, 4, 5, and 6. There were plentiful soloists, but the main occupation was choral singing, for which there were many varied classes, with subdivisions of rural and urban. Among the chief prize-winners were University College Choral Society (unopposed), Barnstaple United Methodist and Uffculme female-voice choirs, and Axminster Women's Institute.

Enfield (February 25 to March 2).—The eleventh Festival showed an entry-roll of over a thousand (including sixty-three choirs nearly all of children). In all there were a hundred and seventeen classes. The numbers show a large increase in all directions. The string classes number eighteen, and it is hoped that string orchestras will soon be added. Other excellent features are classes for pianoforte-playing from memory, for percussion band, double trios, sight-reading, self-accompanied song, and self-trained choirs. This Festival was the first to introduce solo and choral verse-speaking, in English and French. In the classes for children from twelve to fourteen the first three places went to teams from Enfield County School (Miss Woods and Miss Bidwell). The Central School (Miss Lowman) gained the highest award in the Junior Choirs class, and in the Girls' Club class St. Stephen's Girls' Fellowship (Miss Crane) was first. Chase Side Boys (Mr. Hickford) won the prize for sight-singing, open to choirs in six classes.

Kettering (February 13-16).—The twentieth Eisteddfod of the Kettering and District Sunday School Union broke records, and ended up with a display of high-class choral singing. The test for mixed-voice choirs, Parry's 'My soul, there is a country,' set the Leicester Oriana Choir a mark ahead of Northampton Co-operative Choral Society. Rushden Adult School was first in the male-voice, and Mrs. Palmer's Bedford Choir in the female-voice class.
